NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE glorious weather has been the most significant event of the week. All over the country the sun has shone; the earth has clothed itself in fresh beauty, and human hearts have been happy. It has helped us all to forget our problems and our cares and the difficulties of organised living in great cities, and taken us back in a childlike spirit to primitive things, close to the heart of nature and the Divine Author of beauty. Money and all that money can buy have appeared strangely unimportant in these prodigal hours, for there are primroses in the hedgerows, and larks in the sky, and the green sod beneath our feet, and in our hearts Spring's blessed gift of new life.

WE hope that with the gladness there will also come a deeper sense of our own trusteeship for the flowers of the field and the wild creatures of the wood. There is so much that we can spoil by selfishness or wanton indifference. English country-roads with their luxuriant hedgerows and wayside grass are as precious as any costly work of art, and once they have been destroyed they can never be restored. In a letter to the Times Lord William Cecil speaks of a time in his own remembrance when every road-side in Hertfordshire "had ox-eyed daisies, centaury, scabious, and a hundred other flowers. The tall elm gave height and outline to the distant view, besides foretelling the spring by its friendly red. The bird-cherry, especially if planted against Scots fir, exceeded in its white beauty any tree on earth. But all this is passing away now three destroyers are let loose upon the land—first, the flower collector has nearly exterminated the primrose and the foxglove; but indeed he is the least effective of the three—far more dangerous to beauty is the up-to-date agriculturist, who fells all trees and abolishes hedgerows; while last but not least there is the county council, which carefully mows the roadside so that not even the humblest flower can seed and perpetuate its charm."

"Now if we were a poverty-stricken country," he continues, "I should not have a word to say; if we had to see to the cultivation of every square yard of land to provide food for ourselves there might be no room for beautiful things. But the reverse is true. We have parks and gardens hidden away from the gaze of all but the owners by walls and palings. We spend thousands of pounds on cultivating the often hideous exotics of other climates where no one can see them, and will not spend pennies to perpetuate the far greater natural beauties of our own country where all the world can admire them. . . . A hundredth part of the energy spent in preserving game would prevent the robbing of flowers. Hedges need only be cut low at corners where their unimpeded growth might be a danger to traffic, and elsewhere they might be allowed to grow high. Hedge-cutters might be told to preserve wild roses, and so not only make the hedge impenetrable but also beautiful, while the roadside could be left as a natural preserve of the perennial flowers, which, with few exceptions, are not dangerous 'weeds' to the farmer."

ANOTHER spring-time appeal comes from Mr. Galsworthy, but it is on behalf of those who, if they have ever seen the pageant of flowers, can now only behold it with the eyes of the mind: "The Spring is on us. Every day the leaves are being unfurled and stained a deeper green; soon the chestnut-trees will be coming in bloom; and the sky will have the flashing whiteness of April among its pools of blue, and purple rain storms. The lambs will be leaving the ground with all four feet at once, and innumerable flowers will be opening everywhere. None of these things the blind will look upon. All their other senses will tell them that the Spring is here, but they will not see it. Only so much Spring vision will they have as books can give them." These words, written so sincerely out of a deep feeling of compassion, are intended to call forth a practical response of gratitude for the gift of sight in the form of a donation to the fund for the production of literature in Braille type, which should be sent to Mr. C. Arthur Pearson, hon. treasurer, National Institute for the Blind 206, Great Portland-street, W.

It must have rejoiced the hearts of broad-minded men to find the Times heralding the advent of Easter with a leading article against the compulsory use of the Athanasian Creed. The plea, it says, that many Churchmen's consciences shall no longer be violated by the repetition of the "damnatory" clauses is reasonable. "When men's minds are more drawn to consider the great mysteries which all Christians accept than to trouble about their metaphysical explanations it brings a sense of pain to declare the perdition of those who reject the precise terms of an abstruse formula. The present use of the Athanasian Creed in the Church of England has been condemned by many of its most illustrious divines. It is plain that at the present time very many devout Churchpeople find its repetition almost intolerable. A great opportunity will have been missed if the revision of the Prayer Book which is now in process does not secure some satisfactory alteration of the rubric for their relief."

* * *

A FEW voices have been raised against this protest, one clergyman going so far as to assert that in a long and varied experience he has never discovered any member of the Church of England who objects to the present practice, "and not one of the hundreds of incumbents that I have met has mentioned it as a difficulty." To this Bishop Baynes replies that there is something almost appalling in the statement, for it seems to him to reveal a state of ethical callousness about the real meaning of words. Even the Bishop of Oxford, who has grown very sensitive about his own orthodoxy, acknowledges that no clergyman can recite the clause in question, "so sweeping and so universal, without a mental reservation which it does not really convey."

* * *

WE doubt, however, whether much relief for uneasy consciences can be found in the discovery that the Quicunque Vult is not a creed after all. "It is to be regarded as a psalm or hymn rather than a creed," according to the writer in the Times. "There is a great difference," the Bishop of Oxford informs his clergy, "between a personal affirmation of belief and the joining in the general proposition of a canticle." This may all be historically true. At first it may have been simply "a battle-cry of the faithful in days of fierce conflict." But the crucial point is this, that the compilers of the Prayer Book did not treat it in this way. In the Articles it is placed on exactly the same level as the other two creeds, and on the Sundays when it is appointed to be used it takes the place of the Apostles' Creed, a plain intimation surely to the worshipper that it is intended to be of equal obligation. This is the real source of the difficulty, and the liberal clergy will be very unwise to relax their efforts to banish it from public worship on the plea that it is only a canticle after all.

NONE of the Easter Conferences arouse in us a livelier interest than that of the National Union of Shop Assistants. It is the one occasion in the year when a large body of men and women, upon whose promptness and politeness the whole community depends for the comfort of daily life, makes itself articulate and formulates its demands upon public consideration. It will hardly be denied by anybody with knowledge of the facts that many shop assistants are underpaid and overworked, while the grievance of the living-in system, especially in the drapery trade, ought to have been removed long ago. At the same time the difficulties of effective combination are very serious, and other classes of workers, the conditions of whose labour gives them more contact and cohesion, find it easier to focus attention upon their grievances. Even at the time of their annual conference some of the newspapers show an almost culpable indifference to their proceedings, guided no doubt by the journalistic instinct for the subjects which interest or entertain their readers. But an age that loves shopping is much to blame if it fails to take a lively interest in the welfare and happiness of the assistants, who are expected to study our whims and to be always prompt and obliging and well-dressed, no matter how poor, tired, and dispirited they may be. We make tremendous demands upon them, and give them far too little personal thought or public sympathy in return.

The annual Conference of the National Union of Teachers has been in session at Lowestoft this week. The President, Mr. W. B. Steer, of Derby, devoted his address to the status of the teacher. The threatened dearth of teachers, he pointed out, had become very serious, and was due to the unattractive conditions under which their profession was carried on. There must first of all be a living wage. At the present time there were 4,496 certificated class masters who receive less than £100 per year, and 5,127 certificated class mistresses who receive less than £70 per year. "The potential recruits will not enter the teaching profession," he said, "until the nation can assure an eventual salary of at least £200 per year to every man and £160 to every woman who responds to the call, with higher remuneration still should their industry and success, and the smiling face of fortune, lead to the head-teachership of a school."

* * *

MR. STEER also pleaded that there must be more scope for the play of ambition in the teaching profession. This could be secured by a system of promotion from the teaching ranks to administrative posts and inspectorships.

"It should not be deemed presumptuous," he said, "for the newly certificated teacher to dream that he may one day become Chief Inspector of England or Wales, or, maybe, Permanent Secretary of the Board of Education. In every other profession there is the advantage of prospect, and teaching would acquire a different estimation if it led naturally to those posts of responsibility and control for which it is the best, because the most natural, kind of preparation. . . . The constant supply of efficient teachers will never be secured until the better paid posts of the profession of education are all put within the teacher's reach, and this plan would make administration more effective, inspection more rational, and teaching infinitely more hopeful, and therefore more effective. . . . The widening of the outlook of the teacher is necessary in order that the best men and women may be attracted to the work, and if university training be essential for the higher service, that but proves that the Government ought, long ere this, to have arranged that a university career shall be provided for every new entrant into the profession."

UNFORTUNATELY, booming trade has its drawbacks in an increased drink bill. Mr. G. B. Wilson, the secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance, states in his annual letter to the Times that there was an increase last year of more than £5,000. "Last year," he writes, "was one of great prosperity, and the weekly wages bill of the nation was probably higher than it has ever been before, so that it is not surprising, though regrettable, that a certain proportion of the increased earnings were expended in the purchase of intoxicating liquors. It is encouraging, however, to note that the consumption of alcoholic liquors, as measured by the figures of per capita consumption, is still much lower than it was during the periods of trade activity which culminated in 1874 and 1899."

* * *

It would be a mistake, however, to allow ourselves to be unduly elated by this last sentence. There has certainly been a distinct improvement, but the consumption per head is still terribly high. For England and Wales Mr. Wilson estimates it at £3 14s. 2d. per head; for Scotland £3 6s. 9d. per head; for Ireland £3 3s. 1d. per head. In the second part of his letter he calls attention to the undoubted influence of this inordinate consumption of alcohol upon pauperism, physical deterioration, infant mortality, and crime, a fact which ought never to be lost sight of in our growing concentration upon other aspects of the social problem.

"The statistics issued by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children," he writes, "give a faint indication of the suffering to the nation's children caused by the drinking habits of our people. During the past 10 years the Society has dealt with cases of proved cruelty or neglect affecting no fewer than 1,340,251 children, of whom 9,358 died; and the number of offenders amounted to 625,170; and the director states that 'it is not an exaggerated estimate that 90 per cent. of the cases of neglect inquired into by the Society's officers are due to the habits of excessive drinking on the part of one or both of the parents.'"

FRIENDSHIP WITH GOD.

A LITTLE time ago I read some passages from one of the famous sermons of St. Bernard the Abbot of Clairvaux, who was born in 1091, and was one of the most distinguished saints of the Roman Church, and is famous for his work in reviving and purifying Monasticism. Afterwards I read from the Great Quaker, William Penn, who was born centuries later in 1644. One might think that a completer contrast could never be found than that between a Roman Catholic and a Quaker; and yet, if we reflect for a moment, we see how much they have in common. So true is Penn's remark that "the Humble, Meek, Merciful, Just, Pious, and Devout souls are everywhere of one Religion; and when Death has taken off the mask, they will know one another though the divers liveries they wear here makes them strangers." St. Bernard was outwardly as austere and as simple as the Quaker. Both lived a life of abstinence and hardship; the Roman saint voluntarily in his bare cell, the Quaker compulsorily in prisons for breaking unjust laws. St. Bernard's first monastery was a rude hut roughly put together; and he and his companions lived on beech nuts and on roots. The Quaker, after many vicissitudes in prisons, found his retirement in a Sussex homestead, and gave us his "Fruits of Solitude," "this enchiridion," as he calls it, this handbook or manual. The monk blessed God for giving him the peace of his abiding place, for being allowed to withdraw from the world. "Trust to one who has had experience," says St. Bernard, "you will find something far greater in the woods than you will in books. Stones and trees will teach you that which you will never learn from masters."

And William Penn says in his preface: "The author blesseth God for his retirement, and kisses that Gentle Hand which led him into it. For though it should prove barren to the world, it can never do so to him. He has now had some Time he could call his own; a Property he was never so much Master of before: in which he has taken a view of himself and the World." And he proceeds to speak of Time and the World almost like a voice from the cloister; and yet with a keen and eager zest for the joy and loveliness of Life—Life in its true depth and purity and fulness. "I can hardly wish any man better than that he would seriously consider what he does with his Time: How and to what ends he employs it; and what returns he makes to God, his Neighbour, and Himself for it. Will he ne'er have a Leidger for this? This the greatest wisdom and work of Life. To come but once into the world, and trifle away our true enjoyment of it, and of ourselves in it, is lamentable indeed. . . .

" . . . We understand little of the Works of God, either in Nature or Grace. We pursue False Knowledge, and mistake education extremely. We are violent in our affections, confused and unmethodical in our whole life; making that a burthen, which was given for a Blessing, and so of little Comfort to ourselves or others: Misapprehending the true Notion of Happiness, and so missing of the Right Use of Life and way of haply living.

"And till we are persuaded to stop, and step a little aside, out of the noisy Crowd and incumbering Hurry of the World, and Calmly take a prospect of Things, it will be impossible we should be able to make a right judgment of ourselves, or know our own Misery. But after we have made the just Reckonings which Retirement will help us to, we shall begin to think the World in great measure Mad, and that we have been in a sort of Bedlam all this while."

"Reader," he adds, "whether young or old, think it not too soon or too late to turn over the leaves of thy past life: and be sure to fold down where any Passage of it may affect thee. And bestow thy remainder of Time to correct those Faults in thy future Conduct: be it in relation to this or the next life. What thou wouldst do, if what thou hast done were to do again, be sure to do as long as thou livest, upon the like occasions."

That should suffice as a sufficient commendation of Penn's "Fruits of Solitude." Let me turn to speak briefly of what it may sum up for us in our own experience, namely, friendships—friendship of devout books, friendship of devout persons, but above all, Friendship with God. We can imagine the richness of the simple heart that grew these pleasant fruits of reflection; that found calm after a fevered and tumultuous youth; that heard tender messages of communion and consolation in silence and in retreat, and found the divinest and sweetest of all companionships at the centre of solitude. And it may be so with us. It has been said: "We mortal millions live alone"; and this is true—sometimes very sadly true. At the core of our life we seem lonely and isolated; we have a privacy which no one can quite penetrate. No—neither friend, nor lover, nor husband, nor wife; not even ourselves. I am at bottom a mystery to myself as you are to yourself. There is a veil before our most inward Holy of Holies, which even we ourselves know not how to lift or to withdraw. The last shrine, the hidden secret of our personality is there. In this lonely interior solitude we each separately live our deepest life. We are apart; we seem strangers and aliens to each other in the things that matter most. I walk through deserts and in a world of my own. I sail the seas of the spirit-world alone. No one knows me. No one except—and what a tremendous exception it is—except God. Alone, yet not alone, for the Father is with me. Alone, yet not alone. The exception is a universal and complete exception. It negatives and annihilates all I've said about isolation and apartness and solitude. The deserts are now deserts that blossom as the rose, and blow with all the perfumes of Arabia. The sea is full of sails, for God is with me, and in God I find again my fellow men whom I cannot understand except in God; whom I cannot join except in His uniting spirit. For God is the spirit of friendship and the bond of peace, and the place and tie of our communion. I am no longer lonely in Him. Isolations coalesce and merge in Him. Our separations are broken down; our distrusts and reservations, our coldnesses and suspicions all disappear in Friendship with God. Your need of Him is my need of Him. Your joy of Him is my joy of Him, and apart from you I may not be fulfilled in Him, because we are members one of another, in one body under One Head. The same blood of God runs through us, and pulses in our hearts. Our separation becomes unity. We being many become one man in Christ. As a great mystic said: "We behold that which we are, and we are that which we behold, because our being, without losing anything of its own personality, is united with the Divine Truth."

And this "Friendship with God" changes, transforms, transfigures everything. It is the one thing that makes the worth, the Timelessness of life. It is the one secret Love that makes all other loves true, and pure and precious. It is the one smile of benignity and gladness that lights up the face of the world, and makes its mystery divine and accessible and homely. It is what makes our fellow-mortals no longer strangers and aliens, but children of the same family—a beloved, sacred fellowship, a true Church of Christ. It is what makes work a service of affection. It redeems our drudgery with the spirit of a Christ-like love. Wherever we go, in whatever state we are in, we may have God with us as the unseen friend, the invisible presence, the hidden companion. The flame of a heavenly altar burns with worship in our several hearts, and all the flames are one flame—that “simple Flame” which Dante saw as God.

AN OPTIMIST'S APOLOGY.

It is frequently concluded in discussions popular at debating clubs and in the correspondence columns of newspapers at certain times of the year that neither the optimist nor the pessimist is perfectly justified in his view of life. It is objected that life is a tangled skein of good and evil, that optimism no more than pessimism can be accepted by the rational man as a true explanation of things, that optimism and pessimism are matters of health and disposition, and that perfect sanity always avoids extremes. Now, in spite of the apparent reasonableness of these observations, they are not the less depressing and pessimistic. For my part I should prefer the more sincere and consistent gospel of Schopenhauer to this timid optimism which would decide in its own favour only after a careful balancing of pros and cons, of this good and that evil, as if it were purely a question of evidences and the sum total of experience. Truth is more often to be found in one of, or beyond these extremes, which, according to this kind of critic, perfect sanity avoids. It is useless to put the sum of evil under the sum of good and attempt to discover the difference by subtraction; it would be wiser, if any such process of calculation were allowed at all, to make the sum one of simple addition, or, in other words, take life as it comes without vexing ourselves over abstract and metaphysical speculations as to the good or evil of it as a whole. Good and evil are not to be compared or contrasted as if they were items of debit and credit; they are in nature too disparate and incomparable. They are, indeed, alternative, like light and darkness, and exclude each other from being. Evil and good are each positive and permanent in their essence as long as they endure, and our experience of either arises from the contest in our own wills of the one with the other for supremacy.

But there is an optimism much more positive and rational than that of the “cheerful idiot,” who thinks that others’ misfortunes are blessings in disguise and that everything is for the best in this rose-garden of a world. For optimism of this sort is often an expression merely of selfish insensibility to the sufferings of others, of a lack of sympathetic imagination, or of actual experience of similar pain, and this optimism is often the same spirit which by pure insensibility inflicts it upon others. Thus strength always scorns weakness; health, sickness; sanity, insanity; wealth, poverty; happiness, misery; and success, failure; and as a contemporary writer has said, “It is when we are most happily aware of our own physical well-being that we are least accessible to any concern for the misery of other sentient creatures.” But after the first agony of loss or grief is spent, the hope not infrequently arises in the sufferer as a kind of alternative to the actual evil that “all is for the best,” even while at the same time rebutting it, but this is only when the evil has been endured, when the bitter rue has been drained, and when it has been realised that “neither present years nor years unborn” will ever restore to us the things we have once lost. But this bitter hope which arises in the outraged and lacerated heart is a very different thing from the flippant assurance that misfortunes are blessings in disguise, although, of course, this depends in some degree upon the source from which such assurances come.

For what is optimism? I will try to state what, with all the abysses of pain not forgotten, is my own belief as an optimist. Optimism is, in the first place, that very agony of revolt which arises in the throes of evil. It is the cry of pain on receipt of the blow, the tears of protest when the joy and meaning of life are suddenly snatched away, and it is also the reassurance and peace which spring up in the heart after grief has been chastened by time (but this is no remedy). In youth, optimism is ambition, love, and hope; in manhood, it lies in fulfilment and labour; in age, it is in regret and retrospect still tempered, perhaps, by hope. It is the centre, the desirable ideal, the perfect bliss to which we turn like sunflower to sun, from birth to age. It is the belief in good in despite of all the apparent omnipotence of evil. It is the law of life itself, the principle of growth and development, of love and life, procreation and preservation, and at last in its turn of decline and dissolution. It is the principle which makes life tolerable and possible and even happy day by day for hundreds of thousands, and the alternative to death and evil and endless pain.

It is a belief which poets and thinkers of all ages have cherished and celebrated that there is no evil which has not its antidote, and no human need which has not somewhere its satisfaction. As this is stated by Mr. Mallock, “There is no desire implanted in any living creature which does not indicate the existence somewhere of that wherewithal it shall be satisfied. Thus for bodies numbed with cold there is the warmth of sun and fire. For tired muscles and heavy eyes there is sleep. In the hunger of the lamb is a witness to the growing of the green pastures. So it is with the soul.” Optimism cannot and does not dispute the existence and the evil of evil; it rather presents an alternative in good. Evil, says the optimist, is essentially false, the very word implies something that should not be (and anything which should not be in a permanent and absolute sense is not). Evil has no entity, no authority, as good has and as truth has. Everything in his view is either all good or all bad, since it is impossible for two such contradictory terms both to be absolute and true. And he from his heart and soul decides for truth even though there were nothing true.

To the optimist, as also, perhaps, to the pessimist, it does not seem that any other faith than his own is possible or rational. The difference between his own belief and that of the pessimist is, he conceives, just that between a plenum and a vacuum, philosophy and no philosophy, truth and falsehood, belief and none. He may, it is true, meet every kind of evil and misfortune, but if he be a true optimist his belief will only be the greater. His attitude may be illustrated by an adventure of Paracelsus in Browning’s poem:—

I remember well
One journey, how I feared the track was missed,
So long the City I desired to reach
Lay hid, when suddenly its spires afar
Flashed through the circling clouds.
You may conceive
My transport. Soon the vapours closed again.
But I had seen the City, and one such glance
No darkness could obscure.

To the optimist there seems a taint of insanity in the philosophy of pessimism; notwithstanding its show of evidence and logic, for him it is the difference between health and sickness. The morbid imaginings of a diseased or distempered mind are no doubt subjectively real and true for the invalid, and to the sick there may seem no escape from the phantasmal evils and anguishes of existence, but as the mind recovers health all these horrors and their attendant logic disappear as those of a nightmare disappear at day-break. One does not escape from them by argument, or by intellect, but by simply waking up. The optimist, therefore, holds that all evils, actual and physical as they are in effect, are of the nature of evil dreams and darkness. (In this respect he shares the belief of the Christian Scientist, but with the difference that he does not deny the physiological basis of evil, and would for physical evils seek to apply their physical remedies, or remove their physical causes.) And evil for him is not to be expelled, therefore, by a pitchfork, but being of the nature of darkness is dissipated best by admitting the light, and when necessary for this purpose cleaning the begrimed windows of the body and soul. There is a reality and assurance in the experience of this faith, in peace, health, love, and happiness which is never present in the most poignant and oppressive horrors of delirium or disease, just as there is a reality in our waking moments which is superior to the most vivid of dreams. The passions of despair, fear, grief, he cannot but associate, like Spinoza, with sickness and pusillanimity and even insanity, which is perhaps their logical end. Nature, as Anatole France declares, is never on the side of the inconsolable.

In brief, optimism refuses point blank to believe in the omnipotence of evil, and recoils from such a conclusion as too monstrous and false. "The only darkness," said Bacon, "is ignorance," and in a similar way the optimist contends that the only evil is darkness. Just as children outgrow the terrors of the dark and night-time, so the optimist trusts men will yet outgrow the fear of evil, as indeed they have outgrown some other superstitions. Everything must be right. Even the platitudes of consolation in common and sometimes insincere use have a profound basis in this ultimate belief in good, although this is often expressed obscurely:

Oh yet we trust that somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill.

A man who does not possess this belief must in some manner have lost his way and missed his immortal human destiny.

OUR VILLAGE.

I.

To catch the spirit of our village, one should arrive on an early spring morning after a long night journey from a far place where no hills are. In a moment the jaded sense and the jarred nerves are soothed and restored. For in that moment the whole soul is bathed in the balm distilled out of the ages of ancient peace, or ever the tribe of man awoke to life and love and their attendant pain. In the early morning the Hills have not quite settled back into their places after their rhythmic dance beneath the moon, to which Ceridwen summons them night after night; they have not yet put on their look of majestic boredom, and one surprises in their green verdure the glint of their drowsy-lidded eyes, and in the undulating lines of their contour the subsiding motions of their heaving bosoms. None of the villagers have witnessed this Titanic dance, or for that matter seen the revels of the Little People around the pool of Tylwyth Têg, which everybody knows goes on. None, save one; and he is but one of the "fools of God." Alone he lives in a rude hut in a cleft of the hills, and no fear has he of the tempest or dark or death or doom. With the repute of something out of gear, of being daft and fey, goes strangely a respect as for a pious, proud and precious character. Indeed, the man is a miracle. With all the stars against him, he has preserved his heart fresh and green, his vision pure and his faith undimmed. His tragedy has not embittered, but rather mellowed his relations to men. Had he chosen to curse, none had right to offer reproof, for he has had cause to curse. But his good angel prevailed. His story takes you a generation back. The village belle had dismayed a galaxy of suitors by choosing for her mate this man, then a rising mechanic. Something in the dark eyes distinguished him from the rest of his compeers, and though not so glib of tongue, nor so obtrusive in masculine grace, his quiet strength and reserve and worth seemed to have won recognition and affection. To hasten the marriage, the girl made up her mind to add to the domestic funds by taking a situation in a London house; she could thus also see a little of the world ere settling down. Letters were few to village addresses in those days, but twin hearts know modes of communication all their own. Several years passed, and the bride did not return. Then came a message from a mutual friend, a comrade of the rosier days, announcing the sad news of a sudden fever and her death. Some souvenirs of their courtship followed soon after. The lover believed, and for a time the light went out of his life. But his love had been too virile, too sacred to suffer eclipse. Nay, the physical separation only served to idealise a passion so spiritual, and her memory became a star to be worshipped, a perfumed altar-flame on which he sprinkled day by day the incense of his dearest desires. The man went about like them who have seen the vision of the Holy Grail, like them who have awakened out of a dream in which the very Christ has shown his wounds, like them who daily taste the gladness of the Lord.

A well-meaning person, familiar with the true facts, and pitying a good man's misplaced trust, furnished a hint that sent the lover to London. Ere the train reached the city, at a suburb station, into the compartment where the distressed man sat came the friend he had trusted, and with him the lost bride with their child in her arms. The quondam village comrade and village bride had married, and to hide their treachery had made up a tale of death. For months the wretched man, wounded in his holiest nature, disappeared from the ken of men; but one day he came back. He was seen walking on the hills with his face to the dawn. Something in him had snapped; but his intelligence remained, and there also remained a gentleness of manner, a courtesy to women, a tenderness to children, that have marked him ever since. This lonely man, betrayed in friendship and in love, has not lost his faith in men. All over the hillside where his home is perched all kinds of plants grow in the clefts of the crags, on the mossy knolls, festooning the bare rocks. They are the hermit's contribution to the beauty of the world, and emblematic of his place in the sun. One cannot chafe at a lesser pain when one remembers the patient sweetness of the man who was deceived, but has remained true, who was belied, but has still believed.

He says, and he lies not in other matters, that the Hills are great motherly Beings; and as fairies of fortune dance around the cradle of a goodly child, so these Hills glide in corybantic coils around the village, guarded by their grandeur, nurtured by their oxygenated breath, and caressed by their entwining arms. Like the infant Jupiter amid a group of adoring goddesses, so lies, embosomed and embowered amid the grassy and the wooded hills, our village.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

SIR,—I should be obliged if you would kindly allow me to make use of your columns to follow up the appeal you were recently so good as to insert from Mr. Monks for the £50,000 Fund. I have to acknowledge with profound gratitude the wonderful response made during the last two years by our people to the plea raised at the Triennial Conference at Birmingham. The ministry of the churches on its roll have learned once more how generous is the support rendered to them by our laity, and we have all thanked God for the evidence of the heartfelt co-operation between the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the National Conference, without which this fine achievement would have been impossible. Knowing, as I have reason to do as much as any man, the great part in bringing us all together in this grand united effort taken by the late lamented John Harrison, I wish that he could have lived to see the fruits reaped from his labours in the cause. What has been done will be a monument to his memory. We have, however, not yet quite completed our task. We have had a stimulus given to us to complete it by Whitsuntide in a most generous offer by Mr. Robert Blake of a second £500 in case it is done by then. The latest figures show £48,346 promised and £40,776 paid. Now the object of this appeal is to let our people know the vital need of reaching £50,000 including the £500, by Whitsuntide. Indeed, it must be done; and I have a word to say about the way to do it. Figures placed in my hands by the indefatigable treasurer, Mr. Monks, to whom, and to Mr. Harwood, the equally splendid secretary, much of our success is due, show the gradation and number of the gifts promised up to date.

No. of Donations.		Total.	Average per Donor in £.
108	£100 and over	£40,450 0 0	374.64
152	under £100 to £20	4,911 2 0	32.31
135	£20 to £10	1,468 18 5	10.88
173	" £10 to £5	883 11 9	5.11
503	" £5	632 4 4	1.26
1,071		£48,345 16 6	£45 2 10

While these figures bear ample evidence of the generosity I have referred to, I hardly think that 173 can exhaust the number of those who would be willing to give from £5 to £10, or that 503 include all from whom smaller sums up to £5 might reasonably be expected. The smallest will be acceptable. I ask our religious democracy to come in to take their share. What is really wanted is a canvass of all our congregations, member by member, without delay, so that all may have the opportunity given them of joining to confer this boon upon our ministry.—Yours, &c.,

H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

SUNDAY CLOSING.

DEAR SIR,—I should like to call the attention of all friends of temperance to a Bill which is now before Parliament for the closing of public-houses on Sundays. It has been introduced into the House of Lords, has passed its second reading there, and is to come before the House of Commons early in May. An Act to the same effect has long been in force in Scotland, and has been found to work well, as have also similar Acts in Wales and Ireland. Why should not England have the benefit of a similar restriction? The Government are favourably disposed towards the Bill, but it will require a strong support from public opinion to secure its passing, for the drink trade will no doubt oppose the Bill most vigorously, though I am mistaken if many publicans, and still more publicans' wives, would not in their hearts welcome the passing of a Bill which would secure them a weekly day of rest.

Information on the subject, and a suggested form of petition, may be obtained by applying to the Secretary of the Central Sunday Closing Association, 1, Palace-chambers, Bridge-street, Westminster.—Yours, &c.,

M. C. MARTINEAU.

MORAL EDUCATION.

SIR,—I have read with much interest the review in your columns of Mr. J. H. Wicksteed's book, "Conduct and Character." May I venture to point out that in very many schools which provide for Unitarian and Trinitarian, Theist and Atheist, Jew, Christian and infidel, no hymn or lesson is permitted in which the name of Jesus occurs, and even the mention of God is fraught with some difficulty. The Moral Education League has provided a series of text books setting forth a system of morals within this limit.

That Mr. Wicksteed barely mentions Jesus proves nothing more than that he has understood the limitations imposed upon him. That he has done the work in no narrow spirit is proved by the fact that of the quotations at the head of the chapters, two are from the Old and three from the New Testament, while the following extracts not unfairly "indicate the temper" of the book. "It is possible that the Hebrews sometimes sacrificed children in this way to their God, but prophets like Jeremiah preached against the foolish and cruel custom, and declared that the God of Israel hated such worship and would punish those who offered it. We are told that in these islands, before Christianity came, the ancient Britons used sometimes to sacrifice numbers of men and women to their gods. . . . All this was put an end to in countries where Christianity came."

If your reviewer deplores the absence of a religious basis he should surely attack the narrow sectarianism of our day which makes such a basis impracticable, rather than the League, which, while Bishops bicker over points of dogma, is at least providing a sound moral teaching to which priest, parent, or teacher may, if they wish, add that basis of "loving obedience to a Heavenly Father" which your reviewer desires.—Yours, &c.,

P. BRANDON-JONES.

Yewbank, Mill Hill, N.W.,
April 13, 1914.

SIR,—Will you spare me a few lines to make a correction? It is not exactly true, as the reviewer of my book of Moral Lessons suggests, that King Alfred's "praying-men" suddenly become in my hands "thinking-men"—or only in the sense that his "fighting-men" become "doctors," "dirt-destroyers," &c., and his "working-men" become all who insist on giving good value for money. I have enlarged all his classes for to-day, and included amongst the prayer-men those who by word or thought help to make the world what our ideals prefigure it. It is of course true, however, that those who use the book are intended to supplement it; for it would be impossible to write a book of moral lessons based upon the common ground of all moral teachers without omitting many vital things, and some of those which are to some the most vital. But I believe I am right in saying that whatever our own position as to the basis of virtue in man, neither I nor my committee took it as any part of our purpose to supplant the religious basis of teaching.

The difficulty of providing even religious moral teachers with something they can all use is illustrated by another criticism of your reviewer's. It was advisable to leave out any specific mention of Jesus by name, as many professing Christians would literally prefer not to have Him mentioned at all than called "Our Lord," if they call Him "Jesus" or "Jesus," if they call Him "Our Lord," or even "him" if they call him "Him." This is not a fancy picture, but what I know to be unhappily true. But this should not prevent teachers and parents of all persuasions from referring to him in their own terms when I speak of some great saying as "in the New Testament."—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED.

OLD AGE HOMES.

SIR,—Your reference under "Notes and Jottings" to Old Age Homes in Vienna and Copenhagen reminds me that when walking one evening last summer in the beautiful hilly region that forms the western suburb of Budapest, my attention was arrested by a group of elegant-looking dwellings that were almost hidden by surrounding trees, and by a number of elderly men who, either singly or in groups, were walking along the high road toward the entrance to the grounds in which the buildings stand. On inquiry I learned that the delightfully situate villas formed one of the Homes for the Aged Poor of Budapest, and that the pedestrians were inmates returning thither. When I expressed surprise that so many of the residents had been granted leave of absence, I was informed by a Hungarian friend that as poverty is not considered a crime in Hungary, and the aged poor are not imprisoned, no permission to leave the Home is required, and that from early morning till late in the evening they can go and come just as they please. On further inquiry I ascertained from an official source that the city of Budapest maintains three asylums for aged poor, and that another to accommodate 2,500 men will shortly be built at a cost of £333,333. All men and women who, having contributed to local taxation for four years, have become unable to support themselves, and have no relatives who can provide for them, are eligible to become inmates of these Homes, and are admitted by order of the City Council. Those poor persons who, although resident in Budapest, are chargeable to other communities, are temporarily received and cared for pending their removal to the place responsible for them. Such as are sick or feeble-minded are suitably treated in the hospital connected with each Home. Healthy inmates perfectly preserve their liberty and are not called upon to do any work, either indoors or out, but if any choose to volunteer for service of any kind they receive suitable payment; and whether they work or not, all receive an allowance of tenpence monthly to be expended as they please.

In the hospital the cost of maintenance of each person is 1s. 4½d. daily, and in the Home only 1s. 0½d. Those poor persons who do not desire to become residents of a Home stay outside and receive an allowance of 12s. 6d. monthly. In the Homes the diet is good, ample, and varied, as the list before me shows, and in fine summer weather the meals are served in the open air beneath the pleasant shade of overspreading trees. If any inmates are absent at meal-times, no food is reserved for them. In the grounds of each Home there is a two-storeyed pavilion for recreative purposes, from the upper balcony of which a delightful prospect is obtained of the wooded hills around, and of the city of Budapest. In the pleasant circumstances and surroundings thus briefly described do the aged poor of Hungary's capital pass their last years in peace and comfort, free from any irritating or degrading regulations.—Yours, &c.,

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

The Philosophy of Religion. By George Galloway, D.Phil., D.D. International Theological Library. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 12s.

THE question how much or how little should be included in "philosophy of religion" is one that demands discussion and settlement. Dr. Galloway appears to regard as legitimate, beneath such a title, practically every mental discipline that has bearing on religion, excepting dogmatic theology, and also some studies whose relevance to religion is very indirect. He divides his philosophy of religion into three parts:—(1) Phenomenological, dealing with the psychical and historical origin and growth of religion, and including some psychology, some anthropology, and a certain amount of the history of religions; (2) epistemological, dealing with the significance and validity of knowledge in religion, and including more psychology, some history of philosophy, and a considerable quantity of logic and theory of knowledge; (3) ontological, dealing with the ultimate truth of religion, and including metaphysic proper and speculative theology. For this remarkably comprehensive treatment of his subject Dr. Galloway offers some fairly good reasons in his introduction; but the task he thus imposes on the reader of following him through a great deal that is necessarily very incomplete, and through much that is questionable, is, we must confess, rather a laborious one; whilst to review the whole adequately within a reasonable limit of space is not possible.

Dr. Galloway has his own point of view, which he calls "personal idealism," and no one can object to that; but it is obvious that, in a matter like "philosophy of religion" everything practically depends on the point of view, and if you know that, you know all a man has to say. A philosophy of religion which should begin simply by setting side by side, without prejudice, various points of view, possible philosophical attitudes towards religion, would be most useful and welcome. After all there cannot be much difference of opinion about the subject-matter; religion is a definite evaluation of life in spiritual terms, and the real question for philosophy of religion is surely just what justification, if any, philosophy can find for the religious view of life. Not, indeed, that it matters ultimately very much whether philosophy justifies religion or not; genuine religious experience carries its own justification with it, and it seems not improbable that, even if science and philosophy demonstrated the postulates of religion to be vain and illusive, religious experience would still survive untouched. It is here the heart that instructs the understanding, and not the understanding that instructs the heart. Religion lives by faith, and the most we can hope for is to show that science does not invalidate such faith, and that there are philosophical ways of viewing experience which make faith easier. Theism is, of course, what Dr. Galloway offers, Theism which is neither Deism nor Pantheism, and holds that God is at once transcendent and immanent, the absolute ground of the world, and yet totally distinct from the world, master of a universe destined for good, and yet allowing an almost unlimited wandering off into evil, source and sustainer of the life of individuals, yet not identifiable with that life, and so on through the whole round of familiar paradoxes. This Theism Dr. Galloway supports by various arguments. His philosophy is something like that of James Ward: The Universe is composed of multitudinous individuals, centres of experience, whose interactions produce all development, but, since out of bare pluralism you can never get unity, it is necessary to postulate a unifying world-ground in which all individuals have their being. This is the first line of argument. The problem of interaction troubles Dr. Galloway: he wants a homogeneous medium in which his monads can act and react on each other, and he is not satisfied to accept Ward's suggestion of "sympathetic support." He therefore postulates, at the basis of the developing world, a "universal medium," the first creation of the world-will, something between God and the world, and yet—once more the paradox—not between them! It is all the old, old difficulty of the many and the one, the one and the many; how, if you start with plurality, to get to unity; how, if you start with unity, to get to plurality. Religion says that God is all in all, that we, as individuals, have no life apart from God, that our true life is only in Him—even to "lose ourselves" in Him—and yet that we are independent, free individuals, that God and the ego cannot change places. No philosophy in the world can justify that paradox, nor show us how both sides are true. Only religion can sustain the paradox, and of religion it is the very life. Pantheism, says Dr. Galloway, declares that "all is one"; Theism, on the other hand, says "all depends on one," and between these there is a world of difference. There may be, but the point is that religion says both, and knows both to be true. Religion is too big for philosophy. Dr. Galloway's second main line of argument for the theistic position is the familiar one that, because the religious consciousness demands a Supreme Value in the universe, therefore such Supreme Value must be, or the Universe is irrational. This is a form of the ontological argument, and it is about the only argument religion can produce. All we can say in the end is that religious experience is its own justification; no amount of philosophy will give religion, but from the basis of religious experience several interesting philosophies can be reached. On the whole Dr. Galloway is very fair, though we think his dread of Pantheism and Absolutism rather exaggerated. Considering the magnitude of the task he set himself he has carried it out well, and if not original, is interesting. S. A. M.

ENGLAND'S PEASANTRY AND OTHER ESSAYS. By Augustus Jessopp, D.D. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.

ALL readers who have romantic memories of Dr. Jessopp's earlier volumes will welcome this last ingathering of the fruit of his busy pen. He was the pleasant mixture of country parson and religious antiquarian to the end, with interest almost equally divided between the men of his parish and the men of the past. But humanity always triumphed, and it is the human touch in his essays which makes them so delightful. Here he has added to his studies of the peasantry and the rural clergy, mingling his own shrewd observation with the romance of parish registers and whimsical stories of bygone worthies. In the essays on St. William of Norwich and St. Martin of Tours he returns with unabated zeal to the world of the mediæval chronicler, and the volume is rounded off with two essays in which he appears as the intrepid ecclesiastical reformer, a part he always played with courage, not entirely, it has been whispered, to his own advantage when the deaneries fell vacant, to which, little to the credit of either Church or State, he was never appointed.

THE SPIRITUAL MESSAGE OF DANTE. By the Right Rev. Bishop Boyd Carpenter. London: Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.

OF making many English books about Dante there is no end. We should be sorry to be without Church and Symonds, Maria Rossetti, Wicksteed and Gardner; but do not they provide all that the beginner of serious intention really needs? We suppose, however, that it is in the order of things for American lectures to be printed in this book-making age, and Bishop Boyd Carpenter is one of the golden-mouthed preachers, who is sure of his public. The preface informs us that the lectures were given ten years ago, that they are "simply thoughts on religious experience as exemplified in Dante's poem," and that they are "compilations from notes—not written lectures." Those who want exhortation and teaching administered to them in terms of Dante, without any of the stern mental application which the study of Dante involves, will find here much to their taste. Only, let them not be surprised if, when they turn from the easy flow of these sermonic pages to the Divina Commedia itself, they fail to understand it.

THE fourth volume of ESSAYS AND STUDIES by Members of the English Association, which has been collected by Professor C. H. Herford (Oxford, at the Clarendon Press. 5s. net) does not carry the weight of so many distinguished names as its immediate predecessor. It is good that work should be valued for its intrinsic worth, apart from achieved reputation, and this no doubt is a virtue which the inner circle of the English Association is anxious to promote; but in a volume which is also intended to make its appeal to the general reader some information of a personal kind, if only in the form of a prefatory note, would be welcome. Of the seven essays "English Prose Numbers," by Professor Oliver Elton, a highly technical discussion of the laws of rhythm in English prose, is perhaps the most important. For students of poetry there is a contribution to the fairly familiar theme of "Platonism in Shelley," by Mr. L. Winstanley; while the taste of the quite modern man is catered for in a discussion of the Plays of Mr. John Galsworthy by Mr. A. R. Skemp.

WE have received NONCONFORMIST ARCHITECTURE by Ronald P. Jones, M.A. (London, at the Lindsey Press. 1s. 6d.). As the contents of the volume appeared recently in our own columns we are perhaps precluded from the usual task of criticism. Mr. Jones has achieved the distinction of a first essay in an untrodden field. We hope that he will elaborate his historical notes and his practical hints and suggestions in a larger work. Meanwhile he will have rendered a much needed service to all who are concerned with the designing of buildings for Nonconformist worship, if he persuades them to think out the whole problem from the beginning. Gothic architecture is the expression of a ritual. Nothing more false in art and more distressing to sensitive taste can well be imagined than the bad Gothic interiors of many modern Free Churches, furnished with highly varnished pews and a hideous rostrum. In comparison the quiet restraint of the old fashioned meeting house has a great deal to commend it. Mr. Jones has enriched his volume with twelve illustrations, including such excellent examples as Friars-street Chapel, Ipswich, and the Octagon Chapel, Norwich. We are sorry that he has not included Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, which for dignity and richness of effect is one of the noblest Nonconformist interiors in the country.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE PARTHENON AT ATHENS.

II.—THE GODDESS OF WISDOM.

WE shall try to understand what the Greeks thought about their highest ideal by calling to mind the many symbols they employed to express those thoughts in their great temple. In the sacred chamber, surrounded, guarded and decorated by the series of beautiful columns, stood the great figure of Athene, the goddess of Wisdom. From the measurements we possess of the temple itself and the description of the statue given by the ancient writer Pausanias, we should think it very large for its home. It stood thirty-eight feet high and held in its right hand a figure of Victory eight feet high. The great statue was made of gold and ivory. It was first carved in wood and then overlaid with the more precious substances. All of it that represented flesh, the face, neck and hands, were of ivory, and the dress was of gold plates beaten out to the shape of its folds, and the eyes were of precious stones. We can scarcely wonder that such a figure has not been preserved, for spoilers would not allow gold, ivory and precious stones to remain after its worship had ceased to be carried on; and the wood would have decayed. We have, however, the description of Pausanias, and there are two marble figures of smaller size which are in all probability like the great one of the Parthenon in design. At any rate, it is from these copies that we have to reconstruct our figure of the goddess of Wisdom.

Athene stood in the temple as a calm and dignified woman, erect upon her pedestal, smilingly looking directly in front of her. One hand rested upon a shield by her side, about which a serpent was coiled. The other hand held outstretched a figure of Victory, which seemed to be offered to the spectator. On her head there was a helmet of elaborate decoration, for three sphinx-like figures rested upon its crown. An ornament of strange design was arranged over her shoulders and consisted of a number of small serpents, held together by a kind of brooch representing a Gorgon's head. We read that originally a spear was held by the hand that rested upon the shield, though how the artist arranged it is difficult to see from the copies that have come down to us.

Now if we try to place ourselves in the small space before this figure and gather what its symbolism would teach us, we shall probably get some idea of the thought of the Greeks in their conception of wisdom. The first thing we would observe is the figure of Victory, for that would be nearest to us. The goddess offers Victory on certain conditions, and these are indicated by the other symbols arranged about the large figure. The Gorgon's head, the cape of small serpents and the larger one coiling near the shield, are all suggestions of evil; for not only in the story of Eden told in the Book of Genesis, but in many other religious legends of ancient times, the serpent forms the emblem of evil. But here in this statue we have the suggestion that evil is overcome. Many small serpents have been killed and hung as trophies about the neck; and although the great serpent is not dead, it is kept within proper limits by the shield. So the thought given is that evil has been conquered. That is why Wisdom offers its worshippers Victory.

Then we note that the figure is crowned with an elaborate helmet, decorated with three strange figures: a sphinx in the centre and a gryphon on either side. The helmet plays a very important part in all picturesque teaching. We remember the wonderful helmet of Mercury, with its magic wings; the wishing cap of so many fairy stories; and in "The Blue Bird" Tytyl wears a little green hat with a diamond which reveals to him the past and the future. And St. Paul, in his letter to the Ephesians, advises young Christians to wear a helmet as part of the armour of God. With the shield of Faith, the sword of the Spirit, the breastplate of Righteousness, he urges us, if we would be wise, to have our feet shod with sandals of Peace and to wear the helmet of salvation. Indeed, one might almost think that the Apostle had seen this statue of Athene at Athens, or a copy of it at Ephesus, and that in his letter he applied its symbolism to the Christian character; for he thinks of all the accessories with which the Greeks clothed their great figure of Wisdom. St. Paul's idea is that we should possess such a character as to be able to resist all the suggestions of evil; and that was the lesson taught by the Greeks in this statue. The gryphons are the symbols of "the troublous powers of the earth," and the sphinx is always used, whether it is found in Assyria, Egypt, India or Greece, to indicate the great problems of life, difficulties that the human mind can scarcely solve. Athene wears the helmet of success over problems and evil forces. This is the sign that she is wise.

All the young Greeks of Athens, as all the young people of the Western lands and more recent times, wished to be wise. The great thinkers and artists had given them this valuable suggestion in the statue erected in their sacred place, that it was not only requisite that they should learn science and music and dancing, but they must learn also how to overcome evil if they would be wise; and that in proportion to their succeeding in this they would be able to undertake something of the great problems of life, and approach the solution of "the Riddle of the Universe."

Athene was said also to wear a beautiful robe which fell in graceful folds to her feet. It was of a beautiful colour, and must have looked dazzling to the beholder, for over the ground of real gold it was brightened with some kind of enamel or paint, so as to represent the colour of the sky of a brilliant dawn. As a colour it harmonised with the pink-tinted ivory cheeks and seemed to echo the satisfied smile that played about the mouth. Mr. Ruskin says of this "robe of light, saffron colour, or the colour of daybreak," that it covered Athene "wholly with favour and love." How lovely must have been her appearance, and what a feeling of calmness and satisfaction must it have induced upon the minds of all who looked at it intelligently and thought of it sympathetically—the attainment of wisdom producing the beauty and joy of love enveloping them like a saffron-coloured robe, and giving them the hopeful feeling that comes with a bright dawn. The thought of this robe was such a pleasure to the Athenian maidens that one like it was woven yearly by them with great ceremony, and was carried by them in a great procession to their beautiful temple.

However, we must not forget that the figure in the Parthenon wore over this beautiful saffron robe a much smaller one, which fell over the shoulders and left arm; and this was not so peaceful in its suggestion. It was the one made up of small serpents and held together by the Gorgon head. It certainly reminded the spectator that all effort was not over when the peaceful robe was secured. The Gorgon head suggested the hard qualities of unsympathetic spirits which in their coldness were capable of turning hearts to stone. The battle against evil is never ended. We might attain a very high degree of wisdom and yet we shall find that there are many evil things still to be watched and fought against. When we become in some degree wise we are apt to look down upon those who are not so wise with scorn and cold contempt. Athene wears trophies of such characteristics over her shoulders, as though to say that in supreme Wisdom these little serpents of evil and the cold contempt of superiority are dead.

Thus, in our attempt to imagine ourselves in the sacred chamber of the Parthenon temple, looking up at the great figure of Athene, we have been led to some lofty suggestions of thought. Though the work we have been contemplating is the work of pagan Greece, we have seen that the suggestions are not very wide of our own more modern and Christian thoughts. They agree in a striking way with the great Apostle of the Gentiles in their form and spirit. They tell us that we all have many evil propensities to guard against, and that in proportion to our overcoming them we shall attain Wisdom. The Athene of the Greeks is not far removed from the thought of the Holy Spirit of the Christian religion; indeed, as we saw last week, the same statue was used at one time as the Pagan Athene, and at another time as St. Sophia, the Christian Divine Wisdom.

It is good to know that the spirit of Eternal Wisdom is for ever offering to us all the prize of Victory, and that we can, each of us, win the bright saffron robe of Love, which, like the beautiful dawn of a new day, will give us hope and encouragement for further conquests over evil, and bestow upon us a peace that the world can neither give nor take away.

LUCKING TAVENER.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

AN INDEPENDENT LIBERAL RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT IN THE PHILIPPINES.

BY THE REV. J. T. SUNDERLAND.

PERSONS interested in the progressive religious developments of our time may well be glad to have their attention called to the "Iglesia Filipina Independiente," sometimes known as the Aglepayan Church of the Philippines, because it has at its head the Rev. Gregoria Aglepay, who bears the title of Obispo Maximo. On setting out on my present journey to the Orient, I was requested by Dr. Wendte, the Foreign Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, to carry the fraternal greetings of the Association to Bishop Aglepay (among other representatives of Liberal Religion in different countries), and to bring back such information as I might be able regarding his religious movement. What follows is the result of two extended and very cordial interviews held with Bishop Aglepay, and also of inquiries made in a number of directions among not only persons connected with this movement, but others—missionaries, educators, and government officials—who have been long in the islands and are well acquainted with religious leaders and movements there.

Before going to the Philippines I wrote Bishop Aglepay informing him of my expected visit to his country, and of my desire to become acquainted with himself and his Church. He answered my letter promptly, assuring me of a warm welcome, and of his interest in Unitarian thought.

As soon as practicable after my arrival in Manila I called at his cathedral in the Filipino part of the city, where I had a very frank and interesting interview with him of more than an hour. He inquired much about the history and religious teachings of Unitarians and the progress they were making in various countries, and told me much about his own movement and the religious principles on which it is based, ending by making me a present of two books which are its authoritative standards of doctrine and worship—one a somewhat extended "Catechism" for use in his churches, religious classes and homes, and the other a volume entitled the "Oficia Divino," which consists of two parts, the first containing what is called the "Gospel" of his Church, and the second part its doctrinal basis and liturgies and the forms of worship used at its regular services on Sunday, and in connection with baptism, confirmation, the sacrament, the burial of the dead, and on other occasions.

On the Sunday morning following my first interview I attended worship in his cathedral. The building, both externally and internally, has the general appearance of a Roman Catholic Church, with pictures, crucifixes, a high altar, flowers, and life-sized statues of Christ and of Mary and her babe. The service, which in form somewhat resembled the Mass, was conducted by Bishop Aglepay himself, with the assistance of several priests. One of the priests read a Scripture lesson, and followed the same by what I took to be a very short sermon (both were in Spanish, and I do not understand that language). There was organ music, and an exceedingly sweet solo by a woman's voice. The cathedral was well filled, but the congregation presented a somewhat unusual sight to one accustomed to Protestant audiences. Here and there were a few benches, all of which were occupied. Most of the area, however, was without seats, but was filled with persons of both sexes and all ages standing or sitting on the floor—here a group of men, there another of women or of young people, yonder a cluster of children, in other places families—parents and children—formed in little circles by themselves. Most faced the high altar, though not all; the small children were permitted some liberty in moving about among parents and friends; but on the whole the audience was quiet and reverent. I never saw a Sunday congregation that seemed so little conventional or formal, or a Sunday service that seemed so much like family worship on a large scale. The American visitor was given a seat among the small group of priests and deacons near the altar. Although he understood only a little of what was spoken during the service, he could not fail to feel the presence of the same Divine Spirit which makes true worship a source of joy and spiritual strength in all lands.

How old is the independent Filipino Church movement?—About 25 years. What is its strength?—It claims to have 24 bishops and 1,900 priests. As to its lay strength I have difficulty in obtaining any very definite information. Different persons estimate its membership all the way from half a million to two or three millions. From what source does the movement come?—It is a great secession from the Roman Catholic Church. What were the causes of the secession?—There were several. One was the tyranny and corruption of that Church. There is overwhelming proof that in few places in the world did the Roman Catholic priesthood ever sink to a lower moral level than in the Philippine Islands under the later Spanish dominance. This unworthy moral character of many of the priests, added to the heavy pecuniary burdens, direct and indirect, that the Church laid upon the people, alienated multitudes.

Another cause which seems to have operated still more powerfully to create the secession and the organisation of a new religious movement was political. The movement started in connection with the Revolution against Spanish rule. It may be said to be, in a sense, the religious side of the effort of the Filipino people to obtain their political independence. The powers that controlled the Roman Catholic Church were in league with Spain. In the struggle between the Filipinos and Spain they sided with Spain, being desirous of the perpetuation of Spanish dominance in the islands. It was natural, if not inevitable, that the people in their revolt against Spain should also revolt against the Church which was the ally of Spain. They wanted a Church in sympathy with their own patriotic ideals, with their struggle for freedom, with their aspirations for a nationality of their own. What is the political attitude of the movement to-day? Seemingly what it was in the beginning. It is plain that the Filipino people now desire independence as much as they ever did. It would be strange, therefore, if a Church born out of a great national revolt against foreign tyranny, political as well as ecclesiastical, and out of a burning desire on the part of the nation for a career of its own, were not to-day as much in sympathy with the idea of national independence as in any past time.

The fact that this new Filipino Church favours national independence causes it to be criticised, sometimes severely, by such Americans as desire the indefinite retention of the islands by the United States. On the other hand, those Americans and others who regard the aspirations of the nation for a career of its own as legitimate look upon the fact that a religious movement is in sympathy with the earnest political yearnings of the people as by no means to be condemned. The fact that Bishop Aglepay was at one time an officer in the Filipino Army of Independence is cited by some as a reason for condemning him. But whether this is just or not depends upon our view of the justice of the Filipino cause.

Is this new Filipino Church likely sooner or later to go back to Rome, as I have heard one or two persons predict?—I see no reason for so thinking. The break with the older Church seems to be complete and final. How is the new Church to be described?—In its forms and ceremonies, its liturgies, and the general mode of conduct of its worship, as has already been intimated, it does not seem to depart greatly from the Roman Catholic Church, such departure as there is being in the direction of greater simplicity and the elimination of such elements of worship as to some minds may suggest idolatry or saint worship. This retention of many of the forms and observances of the Mother Church is natural, and perhaps not to be regretted, as it gives a continuity between the old and the new, and avoids such a violent break as might prove disastrous.

As to ecclesiastical organisation and government, the new Church is somewhat more democratic than the old, although its priests and bishops possess considerable power. In two respects it makes a radical departure. (1) It rejects celibacy, which has been such a source of moral evil in the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippines, and encourages its priests to marry and establish real homes. (2) It has no

Pope, and rejects all foreign ecclesiastical authority.

As to the theology of the Aglepayan Church, I must take space to say only a very few words. The Church is distinctly Christian, in the sense that it bases its teaching centrally upon what it understands to be the teachings of Christ. Nevertheless, its views of what is the teachings of Christ is not orthodox according to either Catholic or Protestant standards. It highly values the Bible, and makes much use of it, but rejects the doctrine of its infallibility, as it claims that Jesus rejected the infallibility of the Scriptures of his time. Its seat of authority it finds not in a book, but in reason, in conscience, in the Spirit of God in man. Hence, it takes the liberty to select from the Bible what it deems of the highest ethical and religious value, and to base its teaching on that. It accepts no religious teaching, coming from the Bible or elsewhere, which seems to it to contradict science. Thus its view of the creation of the world and man is that of evolution, not that of the Genesis legends. Speaking in a general way, it distrusts, even if it does not wholly reject, the miraculous element in the Bible. It distinctly rejects the doctrine of the Trinity as unscriptural and irrational. Yet its reverence for Jesus, his life and his teaching, is very high.

Is this movement to be classed with Protestant Churches?—Bishop Aglepay answers "No." I am told that two different Protestant denominations have sought to form some connection with it, but have failed. Doubtless it is more in sympathy with Unitarianism than with any other form of Western Christianity, yet I have no reason to believe that it would wish to be set down as Unitarian, nor am I certain but that to call it Unitarian would be somewhat seriously misleading. An orthodox Christian missionary said to me, "One thing is certain, it is a movement in the direction of Liberal Christianity." Doubtless the safest thing is to stop with that affirmation. Meanwhile the movement will be watched with interest by all Christians; certainly it will be followed with great interest and sympathy by Unitarians.

A serious setback, in a way, to the independent Filipino Church has been given by the decision of the courts that the Church edifices of the islands built by the Roman Catholic Church belong to that body, and cannot be alienated to the new movement, even in cases, which seem to be very numerous, where whole congregations have joined the movement. Considering the fact that the edifices were village institutions, built by the villagers, and largely by forced labour, the villagers not unnaturally claimed the same as of right belonging to them, and especially when any community went over en masse to the new faith it is not strange that it insisted on retaining possession of its church edifice. I am told that Governor Taft, at first, at least, gave encouragement to this claim. I am also told by a high legal authority who is not favourable to the new movement that if its case had been legally well managed, the decision of the courts would have been the other way. However, as matters went, Bishop Aglepay and his followers lost the Church edifices. Of course, financially and in the matter of prestige this was a severe blow, all the more severe because of the poverty of the Filipino people. It is not strange that after the decisions were rendered there was some falling off of numbers in the movement. However, the Philippine Islands are favoured with a warm climate, so that tents and light bamboo structures of small cost serve well as places of meeting and worship nearly all the year round. To these the adherents of the new faith have resorted; and I am told that it is questionable whether the permanent loss of members has been very great. What the future may have in store for the new movement, of growth or of decline, of course, only the future can reveal; but judging from the testimony which seemed to me most intelligent and most fair, I should say that at the present time the Independent Church, and not the Roman Catholic, has the sympathy of the larger number of the Filipino people.

AMONG AMERICAN CHILDREN.

As there cannot be many British teachers (or American either) who have, in the space of seven months, addressed and conversed with about 280 different groups of American girls and boys, and as I am just concluding this happy task, I trust a brief account of my teaching-tour, October, 1913, to April, 1914, inclusive, may possess some educational interest. Under the auspices of the University of Wisconsin, which is, perhaps, the most progressive cultural institution in the United States, I visited 32 cities, and confronted more than 20,000 people in audiences, in order to show, by means of publicly-delivered lessons, how the theme of moral and civic instruction may be rendered interesting and stimulating to young hearts and minds. In every place, except New York City, the meetings were arranged in official connection with the local Board of Education. The area covered extended from New York to Missouri, and from Wisconsin to Washington, D.C. Typical occasions that stand out in memory are those on which I taught classes in the cosmopolitan Bowery district of New York; before a big convention of teachers at Wausau in Central Wisconsin; at a city lunch club of business men at St. Louis; before some 2,000 people at the New York Hudson Theatre; in the presence of hundreds of mothers at Albany, N.Y.; and in a school at Louisville, Ky., where the children were coloured and all the audience also.

Of the children it may be said, as summarily as truly, that they very much resembled children elsewhere. Occasionally, and more noticeably among those of superior social position, I observed a certain lack of concentrating power, and among the same class a lack of moral discrimination. I mean that they did not so quickly see a moral issue as working-class children. Social causes quite account for these characteristics, which, however, are only superficial; and which, I am inclined to think, may be matched by the same class on the British side of the Atlantic. Speaking generally, I felt very much at home among the young Americans, and counted it a constant joy to exchange thoughts with them. None pleased me more than the little Russian Jews.

No religious controversy ever arose in the discussions which followed the demonstrations, a fact attributable to the wise omission of religious instruction from the public schools. I may add that not much disposition was exhibited for debate at all. This was partly due to the overwhelming preponderance of young women in the assemblies of teachers, and partly to a long-standing habit of silence among American audiences. English meetings are more animated, though I must confess there is more widespread interest in education in the United States than in England. Parent-teachers' associations, for example, are far commoner in America than on our own side of the water. These associations combine the parents and teachers of a school district in social gatherings and entertainments. The question which I think was oftenest put to me was whether I would advise the appointment of special teachers of moral instruction, or desired that each and every ordinary teacher in the grade schools (elementary schools) should undertake the duty. The problem always embarrasses me; for, while I regard character-training as the supreme occupation of a teacher, I am well aware that a proportion of teachers are not admirably adapted for the responsibility. This is another way of admitting that we are in a period of experiment and transition, and that the sooner we can introduce the subject into the normal colleges the better. As a matter of fact I did visit, and teach in, a considerable number of teachers' training-schools, and can report that the students and faculties were, to say the least, by no means indifferent to the importance of the subject, alike to the profession and to the commonwealth. "My board," said one training-school principal to me, "has discussed the question for a year, but done nothing, because the members did not see how the subject could be practically dealt with." He kindly observed that I had helped to display the how.

Certain principles were confirmed in my own mind during this tour, and the many conversations which enlivened my travels. I will select two for brief notice. One is the extreme importance of avoiding those didactic habits known as preaching and moralising. Not a soul ever complained that I left out this dull exercise; I repeatedly condemned it; and the journalists who reported my lessons frequently drew attention to what appeared to them the novelty of the procedure. I venture to emphasise this point, because ignorant critics of the Moral Education League are perpetually raising futile objections to our non-existent propensity for giving solemn advice. Scores of times I pointed out to the audiences that the children had quitted the platform without receiving a syllable of sage counsel from me. The other point relates to a principle which I first expressed in the columns of THE INQUIRER some two years ago, and have since carried to thousands of minds in America and India, namely, that good children need moral instruction. The proposition has a paradoxical air, I freely allow. Nevertheless, I think I can honestly affirm, not a dissentient voice has anywhere been raised against it. I have gone further, and uttered my contempt for the poverty-stricken idea that moral instruction is a sort of spiritual food peculiarly needed by slums and tenement dwellings. If moral training were mainly a corrective of bad habits, there would be a faint excuse for so low a conception of its proper field. But it is not. It is essentially a development of the true, the beautiful and the good in human nature; and the richer the individual nature, the profounder the necessity for instruction, discipline and stimulus.

I may be permitted to add that Dr. F. C. Sharp, professor of ethics and philosophy at the University of Wisconsin, co-operated with me in framing a new syllabus of moral instruction for American grade-schools. The document may have an interest for British educationists.*

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Manchester District Sunday School Association held its sixty-ninth annual meeting on April 10 in the old Chapel, Chapel Hill, Dukinfield. In the morning a service was held, when the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Moore, of Chesterfield. At the afternoon meeting Mr. H. J. Broadbent, who presided, said he regarded it as a feature full of hope and promise that there were many cases where old scholars who had given up attendance at Sunday school and rarely attended church or chapel saw to it that their children went to Sunday school. They had to recognise that the children who came to the Sunday schools nowadays were, thanks to the day-school teaching they received, more intelligent, and therefore more capable of understanding what was taught them, and also more able to discern whether the Sunday school offered something which it was worth their while to accept. Another thing they had to remember was that, however much they might regret it, there was a tendency for the Sunday school to become a half-day institution, and consequently the time available for teaching the great majority of the scholars was being reduced to about forty minutes each Sunday. Those considerations ought to make it very plain that it was incumbent upon teachers to make themselves as efficient as possible. It was, fortunately for them, an unquestionable fact that to-day the aids for the teacher were so admirable that everyone who desired could make himself efficient.

The Committee, in their general report, gave details of the work done by the Association during the year. It was matter for considerable satisfaction that the Blackpool Convalescent Home had been conveyed to the Association by the generosity of Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy.

Concerning the Barleycrofts Convalescent Home for Young Women, the Rev. Lawrence Scott had generously reduced the selling price from £1,000 to £850. This had made it possible for the Association to effect the purchase of the property without undue delay by means of the partial response of the schools to the appeal for the raising of a special fund. There was now a pressing need for the enlargement of the house so that it might accommodate a sufficient number of guests to make it self-supporting, and contributions were urgently required from those schools which had not responded to the appeal.

A passage in the report was as follows:—"It has long been the feeling of members of your Committee that many teachers are in need of help for doctrinal instruction, which might be afforded by supplying them with a simple statement of religious faith, and that a real responsibility is laid upon this Association to see that our young people shall not be left without clear guidance in this matter of great vital import for their future welfare. In the conviction that the optional use of a statement of doctrine has no likeness whatever to the fixity of authoritative dogma, your Committee has attempted to fulfil this responsibility in a manner that cannot put the slightest bondage upon anyone. There had to be a choice between the liberty to do nothing and the equal liberty to do something to guide the young to the possession of a definite faith to live by. Consequently a statement has been prepared and discussed, in the issuing of which the Sunday School Association in London offered to co-operate, with the result that in its final shape it will be published by the London Association for those schools and teachers in our denomination desiring to use it."

The adoption of the report was moved by the chairman, seconded by the Rev. A. Thornhill, and passed, after discussion of an amendment moved by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, and seconded by the Rev. Charles Peach (Manchester) deleting the paragraph in the report beginning "In the conviction that the optional use of a statement of doctrine has no likeness whatever to the fixity of authoritative dogma," which was defeated. At the conclusion of the formal business of the meeting the Chairman extended a welcome to the representatives of kindred associations, who replied in short speeches. An invitation to hold the annual conference at Brookfield Church, Gorton, next year, was accepted.

In the evening a public meeting was held with the Rev. E. G. Evans in the chair, when addresses were given by Mr. T. M. Chalmers on "The Spirit of Modern Sunday School Teaching," by Miss Edith Gittins on "The Ideal Sunday School," and by the Rev. John Ellis on "School and Home."

The Spirit of Modern Sunday School Teaching.

In the course of his paper, Mr. Chalmers pointed out that the tendency of the denominational day-schools to decrease has thrown other churches back on to the Sunday School for their definite religious teaching. Hence comes the reorganisation of Sunday schools all over the country, and the attention given to new methods and to the training of teachers. We must not fall behind. There is, indeed, a large possibility. The present system of religious teaching in the day-school is profoundly unsatisfactory, to the children and the teachers alike. It may well be that secular education would be regarded more favourably if there were an institution ready and able to undertake the work. The Sunday school is the natural place for religious teaching, and it should be prepared to take it over entirely. In that case, the argument that any religious teaching in the day-school is better than none would no longer have any weight. In the meanwhile, it is the duty of the Sunday school to give a broad and enlightened religious education; it must be complete in itself, continuous and graded. And it must be drawn from every helpful source. The day-school does not teach our faith; therefore it is our duty to provide such teaching.

By the issue of lesson notes for teaching the question of what to teach is being solved. The problem of how to teach still remains. The task of bringing within the reach of the teacher the results of recent work in Child Study is yet to be done. While one cannot but admire the self-sacrificing labours of the teacher, it is clear that more is demanded of him to-day. But it is hoped that this expectation will not be disappointed, in view of the general willingness to undertake social work. The modern teacher must not only prepare his lesson; he must also prepare himself. Training in teaching has become a necessity. It may be felt that the short time spent in the school is not worth careful training, but surely every teacher has ample opportunities for using his understanding of children and of the ways of dealing with them. Such knowledge must have the most far-reaching effect on the home. And it is needed there. Much has to be done in spreading modern ideas of hygiene, of health, and the feeding of children, and a great deal has been accomplished. Yet nothing at present is being done to act as a guide towards the moral and religious training of children in the home. There is a vast field for the Sunday school in that direction which has yet to be cultivated. Once teachers realise that in training themselves in teaching, and in the knowledge of children and how to handle them, they are doing a national work of the first importance for the home, a new life will begin for the schools also. As a practical suggestion, it is proposed that each school should appoint a suitable certificated day-school teacher to act as the leader of a circle for training in method and Child Study. If part of one evening a fortnight could be given to one of these two subjects and the other part to the preparation of the lessons under the guidance of the leader, a great step in advance would have been taken. The ordinary preparation class often does not appeal because it gets no further than the Sunday's lesson. Teachers cannot be expected to go frequently long distances to a central conference. The study circle must, therefore, be held in each school. Moreover, it must be a class, not a lecture. Above all, it must be given by someone familiar with the most up-to-date ideas on teaching. Alternatively, some book, such as Thistleton Mark's "Teacher and the Child," might be studied under the leader's guidance.

The four things which go to the making of the modern Sunday school are, therefore, these: Teaching for personality only, not for results; method, Child Study, and a true religious education. The final aim is to awaken, to develop, and to perfect the religious personality of every single child.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union was held at Flowery Field on Saturday, April 4. The proceedings began with a service in the church, conducted by the Revs. J. M. Lloyd Thomas and J. S. Burgess. In his sermon Mr. Thomas made a strong appeal for intensive culture of the religious life. At the close of the service the annual business meeting was held, the Rev. H. E. Dowson presiding. A vote of condolence with the widow and family of the late Rev. W. Harrison was passed in silence. The adoption of the annual reports and balance-sheet was moved by Mr. J. Hall Brooks, seconded by the Rev. H. E. Perry. A vote of thanks to the officers and committee for their services during the past year was carried on the motion of Mr. O. E. Heys, seconded by the Rev. C. E. Reed. The following officers were re-elected:—President, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A.; treasurer, Mr. W. Hudson; secretary, the Rev. John Ellis; auditor, Mr. M. C. Rodgers.

A hearty vote of thanks to the preacher, moved by the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, seconded by the Rev. George Street, brought the afternoon session to a close.

A public meeting was held in the church in the evening, the Rev. J. S. Burgess in the chair. A hearty vote of thanks to the minister and congregation of the Flowery Field Church for their hospitality was moved by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, seconded by Mr. W. Thompson, and carried with acclamation.

The Chairman, in responding, said he and his people had looked forward eagerly to these meetings, and they were gratified if their efforts to entertain the visitors were appreciated. He referred to the sermon that afternoon as a challenge and a call. The proper attitude at such a gathering as that was to sit humbly and reverently in the presence of those who had been asked to speak, and to listen with reverence and care to what the Spirit of God had put into their hearts to say.

Mr. George H. Leigh, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, said it had been his duty to make acquaintance with the condition of the churches in various districts during his year of office. He had read the report and did not notice anything of special character. What struck him was the somewhat weak condition financially. He thought there was room for improvement in that respect.

The Rev. W. Whitaker spoke on

"Liberal Faith and Evangelical Experience." These had not hitherto mingled. It ought not to be impossible for men of mystic religious experience to combine that with full acceptance of liberal faith in religion. The Liberal Faith dealt with general aspects of the universe, not with that which is personal—intimate communion. Unitarian preaching spent much time in discussing great questions—What is God? What is Nature? Evangelical experience said: I have a soul to save! I shall come into the presence of God! I must live as a child of God! That experience was worth far more than intellectual discussion about God and life. Liberal Faith dealt with acceptances. It accepted the universe and presented a rational optimism. There was, however, another side—the troubles of the world, the cry of man for some rich experience of soul on the "Rock of Ages." Liberal Faith was concerned with the whole of life, a rounded personality—religious, æsthetic, artistic, political. Evangelical experience tried to introduce into life gradation of values, and regarded the moral nature as supreme. The question for us was whether we had got enough of the religious life to overcome those antagonisms. We know a lot about mysticism, but that does not make us mystics, we know a lot about religion, but that does not make us religious. We want a greater sense of the unseen, greater power of discipline, the sense of sin and forgiveness and reconciliation. That could only be obtained by committal of the self to God, by daily discipline, by a training of the will, by meditation, by preparation for receptivity.

Mr. Alfred Pilling, of Bolton, said he was glad there seemed to be a disposition in that meeting to extend fraternal greetings to those of other churches. The antagonisms of religious people had often led those who had been religious into scepticism. Such exhibitions as the Kikuyu controversy did great harm to religion. There were those out of touch with organised religion who could not be touched by attempted intellectual proofs, who were ready to respond to the testimony of religious experience. There were men and women who would never enter the church on ordinary occasions, who at three crises would seek its blessing—baptism, marriage, death—this was evidence of recognition of God and need of prayer. As a magistrate he had sometimes felt very sad as he had looked on those from whom humanity had been almost crushed out. Even in the worst, however, there was the germ of good which would respond to the right appeal. He gave a touching illustration of this which had come under his observation quite recently. The sending of a few flowers, with a kindly message, to a remanded prisoner, touched her, and moved her to submit to the discipline advised. Before, she had been as adamant. The first kind word she had heard since her mother's death twenty-two years ago melted her and made her submissive. The speaker pleaded for an extension of Church membership. That meant discipline, it meant also obligation. He contended that the best work in civic life was done by men and women who were loyal Church members.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE.

THE arrangements for the meetings at Liverpool on May 18, 19, and 20 are in a forward state. Among those likely to take part are the Revs. Dr. J. Drummond (Oxford), Dr. W. E. Orchard (Enfield), Dr. S. A. Mellor, Dr. R. F. Rattray, M. F. Bovenizer, H. Drennicó, Donald Fraser, H. D. Roberts, E. Stanley Russell, J. Fleming Shearer, Sidney Wicks, A. J. Humphreys (vicar of St. Paul's, Accrington), Professor Smithells (Leeds), J. F. Marquis, M.A. (University Settlement), C. Sydney Jones, M.A., Mrs. F. Roberts, Mrs. Cousins, Miss A. H. Alleyne. Members of all denominations will unite to offer hospitality, and intending visitors desiring the same are requested to notify their wish to the Hon. Secretary, Liberal Christian League, 28, Red Lion-square, W.C. Besides a service and other evening meetings, there will be afternoon conferences. The subject chosen for the theological session is "God in Modern Thought."

THE annual meeting of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society will be held on Thursday, April 23, at 3 p.m., at the Westminster Palace Hotel, the President, Sir T. Fowell Buxton, presiding. The speakers will be the Right Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., Sir Harry Johnston, Admiral Sir George King-Hall, and Mr. Leslie Scott, K.C., M.P.

As already announced in our columns, arrangements have been made with Dr. John Hunter, who retired recently from the ministry of Trinity Congregational Church, Glasgow, to conduct morning service at University Hall, Gordon-square, W.C., from April 19 to July 26. We are sure that Dr. Hunter's numerous friends in London will welcome this temporary ministry with great cordiality. In order to prevent disappointment we may emphasise the fact that Dr. Hunter will preach in the morning only. The hour of service is 11.15.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Birmingham.—On Easter Sunday the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, in the presence of a large congregation, conducted a very impressive confirmation service at the Old Meeting Church, when 28 young people were received into the fellowship of the Church. A special order of service was used which had been compiled by Mr. Thomas.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—A performance of "Everyman" was given at Waverley-road Church on Good Friday evening, which was witnessed by a large audience. The play was preceded by the singing of a hymn, and a few introductory words by the minister, the Rev. Gertrude von Petzold.

Bolton.—On April 3 and 4 a sale of work was held at the Halliwell-road Free Church, to wipe off a deficit of £25 on current accounts, and to strengthen the financial position of the church generally. The sale was opened on the first day by Mr. J. B. Gass, J.P., Mr. Alfred Pilling, J.P., presiding; and on the second day by Mr. J. Lawson, J.P., Mr. E. M. Taylor presiding in the unavoidable absence of Mr. L. Cropper. There was a good attendance on both days, and the sum of £123 was raised.

Cirencester.—On Sunday evening, April 12, a service in memory of the late Rev. J. Worsley Austin was held at the Unitarian Church, of which his father, the Rev. Henry Austin, is minister, conducted by the Rev. R. Davis, B.A., of Gloucester. The beautiful flowers in front of the rostrum and on the Communion table were afterwards sent to Birmingham to be placed on the grave. Friends attended from Cheltenham, Tetbury, and surrounding villages.

Glossop.—The Rev. Joseph Wilson, of Wood Green, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of Glossop Unitarian Church. He will commence his new duties in June.

Portsmouth.—The annual Good Friday tea and concert in connection with the General Baptist Church, St. Thomas's-street, Portsmouth, was very largely attended. About 200 friends were present at the tea, and there was also a large attendance at the concert, the church being well filled. The Rev. T. Bond presided.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A CLUB FOR DOMESTIC SERVANTS.

The honorary secretary of the Domestic Guild, 60, South Molton-street, has written a letter to the Manchester Guardian giving some details of a scheme which probably few people have heard of, but which seems to be developing on lines that should commend it to servants and mistresses alike. The Guild, which is managed by domestic workers, was started a few months ago, the idea being to provide, first of all, a club where servants, both men and women, can meet each other for social amusement and discussions on their evenings out, and ultimately, a hostel where members can stay when out of place at a small charge instead of spending all their savings in lodgings. Monthly concerts as well as lectures are arranged, and dancing is allowed. Legal advice is given free to members who are in any difficulty, and a registry office is to be started shortly. Employers are invited to show their sympathy by becoming honorary members. The need of such a place has long been felt, especially for the large number of servants who come from the country, and the promoters of the scheme have the real welfare of their class at heart, as is shown by the statement that "we are determined by combining to help our fellow-workers, and, while other people write to the papers and talk about the drawbacks of domestic service, we feel that we are trying to do something practical to make it a better and more efficient profession for men and women."

THE SALE OF PLUMES IN NEW YORK.

It has been urged, as an argument against the exclusion of the plumes of the bird of paradise from this country, that the Plumage Laws of the State of New York does not prohibit their sale. To this Mr. James Buckland replies as follows:—"The plumage laws of the States of the American Union are copied from what is known as the Model Law of Iowa. The provisions of this law are, briefly, that no plumage of any family of birds—with a few insignificant exceptions—that are native to the State, whether such plumage comes from within or without the State, shall be sold or had in possession for sale. As there are no birds of paradise native to the State of New York, its plumage law does not protect these birds. At the same time, it must be remembered that when the Iowa Plumage Law was framed the destruction of bird life was regarded as a local issue only, and the preservation only of birds native to the State was considered. Now that the slaughter of wild bird life throughout the world has assumed proportions so appalling as to threaten the welfare of the human race, the Federal Government has prohibited the import into the United States of the plumage of all wild birds. This, of course, excludes the plumage of the birds of paradise from the States and territories of the American Union."

THE BISHOP OF SALFORD ON PEACE.

We learn from the Peacemaker that the Bishop of Salford has devoted his Lenten Pastoral to the subject of international peace. The message is welcome in its outspoken condemnation of war, the attitude of the Bishop being precisely that of Mgr. Alexander Grisswein, whose recently published book, "Der Friede Christi," is freely cited. It is to be hoped that this useful work, written by a Roman Catholic theologian, will soon be translated for the benefit of English readers who are not able to use it in its German form. The movement within the Roman Catholic Church in favour of international arbitration and the arrest of armaments is an encouraging sign of the times, and it is well to have the testimony of such a vigorous writer to the truth of that fine saying of St. Augustine, "It is more glorious to slay war with the word than men with the sword."

THE CHANGE IN HABITS OF THOUGHT.

Mr. Norman Angell is busy going about the world correcting "fundamental misconceptions," and helping to form new habits of thought for the coming generation. In an open letter to American students he makes use of an illustration which we have heard him give on an English platform showing that a ten-year-old boy of our own time, asked whether he thinks it likely that an old woman would or could change herself into a cow or goat, as lawyers and judges were apt to convict people of doing very readily in the seventeenth century with awful results to the wretched individuals concerned, will almost always reply "certainly not." What has happened to make the ignorant boy decide rightly where those trained men, accustomed to sift evidence, and learned in science, decided wrongly? "It is the unconscious application," says Mr. Angell, "on the part of the boy of the inductive method of reasoning (of which he has never heard, and could not define), and the general attitude of mind towards phenomena which comes of that habit. He forms by reasoning correctly (on the promptings of parents, nurses, and teachers) about a few simple facts—which impress him by their visibility and tangibility—a working hypothesis of how things happen in the world, which, while not infallibly applied—while, indeed, often landing the boy in mistakes—is far more trustworthy as a rule than that formed by the learned judge reasoning incorrectly from an immense number of facts." This idea is of immense value in considering the process of development which is leading mankind slowly away from barbarism, and when it is generally realised that all changes in human nature first take place in thought, more attention will be paid to methods of education, which are very different to the methods of controversy.

THE GEORGE CRABBE CENTENARY.

It is 100 years since George Crabbe was inducted to the living of Trowbridge, which he held for 18 years, and in June celebrations in honour of the poet's memory will take place. A garden party will be given at the picturesque old rectory, where he lived in great contentment and untidiness for so long, a special service will be held at the church, and an exhibition of various articles associated with him in one way or another has been planned. Crabbe became the rector of Trowbridge in his 60th year, a very long time after the production of "The Village," and there were many pleasant and cultivated people residing in the neighbourhood when he went to live there. He won the love of the countryside, and after his death the parishioners subscribed for a marble monument which marks his grave, the work of E. H. Baillie, R.A., the sculptor of Nelson's statue in Trafalgar-square.

ON THE ROAD IN RUSSIA.

In an article in the Times last Tuesday Mr. Stephen Graham returned to a subject dear to his heart in describing some Russian pilgrims of the road—not the pilgrims bound for Jerusalem referred to in an article which we published last week, but wandering, poverty-stricken emigrants making for new countries and seeking land. Yet even the desire for better material conditions seems to be, in the case of the Russian, part of the search for God, just as his idea of smoke is not, as with us, something that pours out of a factory chimney and clouds the sky, but "that which comes forth out of the censor." "The peasants' talk," says Mr. Graham, "nearly always turns to God and religion. The Russians are always en route for some place where they may find out something about God, and if there is a particularly animated conversation in the hostelry of a monastery, a third-class carriage, or a tea-shop or Russian public-house (traktir) it is almost always sure to be about religion. The modern evangelical movement may almost be said to have its birth in the famous but filthy public-house 'Yama,' where originally over vodka and beer, and later more commonly over tea, the question of salvation was continually mooted. In the third-class carriage you will occasionally come across an old man who reads an antique Bible through iron-rimmed spectacles. He has heard that a new sect has been formed by some peasants in some remote village, and is off to discover 'whether they have found anything.'"

THE WOMEN'S SECTION OF THE CHILDREN'S WELFARE EXHIBITION.

The Women's Section of the Children's Welfare Exhibition at Olympia has been organised by the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, and gives, for the first time, a comprehensive survey of the activities of the modern woman. Her devotion to the home and the welfare of the child, her work in industry, business, art, science, and literature, her interest in travel and out-door sports and recreation are all represented, the underlying idea of the Exhibition being that woman's kingdom, though centred in the home, extends far beyond it, and embraces all varieties of human experience and endeavour.

* * *

HOUSING reform, the care of infants, the nursing profession and sweated industries receive special attention, and considerable stress is laid on the political and civic activities of women. The Women's Local Government Society, the Women's Municipal Party, the French Section arranged by L'Union Française pour le Suffrage des Femmes, the National British Women's Temperance Association, and the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies itself are all represented, and will give information about the importance of women's work in public life. The International Women's Suffrage Alliance also holds a section, and will show what progress has been made by women in other countries. Finally, every evening a lecture will be delivered on some subject of special interest to women, Miss Ivimy (Probation Officer for Juvenile Offenders), Dr. Elizabeth Sloan Chesser, and Madame Aino Malmberg, of Finland, being among the lecturers. The Exhibition will be open till the end of the month.

THE SALVATION ARMY AND THE PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

The Salvation Army's exhibit at the Panama-Pacific International Exhibition to be held in San Francisco this summer ought to prove one of its most interesting features, for it will include a model African farm, showing the methods by which the Zulus are being trained in agricultural work, as well as a model of the leper colony in Java. A convention will be held in August under the direction of General Bramwell Booth, also daily open-air meetings at which leaders from every country, accompanied by native bands, will speak. It is estimated that more than one hundred thousand members of the Salvation Army from forty-six countries will be present at this convention.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

D. AMOS.—A problem is said to be "cooked" when it can be solved by a method overlooked by the composer. As to "kink," this expression does not apply to chess particularly, but implies a little trick or catch of some sort. I believe its serious application is in mechanical considerations—a piece of wire with a twist or bend in it. It is also used, I believe, to describe a weakness in character. One who habitually hoards up half-sheets of note-paper, for instance, could be described as having a "kink" in his methods, not necessarily derogatory.

R. B. D. (Edinburgh).—I fear I must ask you to withdraw your criticism on my No. 51. 1. P. B5 is defeated by 1... K takes KP. The "kink" in No. 51A has proved too much for you. It was originally published in a Birmingham paper, and every single solver failed to master it.

E. C. (Highbury).—Thanks for your kind opinion.

Our No. 53 is first prize-winner in an American "Problem-Club" monthly competition, judged by Mr. Alain C. White, of New York. This is a small organisation of members who are interested in problems, apart from the game, amongst whom a monthly pamphlet is circulated. It numbers amongst its members many distinguished composers and critics. I have recently entered one of my problems, and am told that it will be set up on a monster demonstration board at one of their meetings in Philadelphia. It is to be wondered why some such organisation has not been formed in this country.

NEW BOOK by JOHN DENDY,
Author of Successful Life: A Series of Essays.

THE LARGER LIFE.

*A Way through Experience
towards the Truth.*

Crown 8vo. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d.

This book is not intended to be a religious text book nor to advocate any particular form of religious belief. It is concerned with certain great questions which lie behind all forms of religion and with which all forms of religion are more or less closely bound up.

It is partly addressed to those who are feeling the pressure of those questions, while at the same time they do not know which way to turn for a chance of escape from their difficulties. More especially the author has hoped that it may be of use in directing the attention of younger people who have not become set in their habits of thought, to a way of looking at life and the world in which they find themselves, which the ordinary school education does not give.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE is nothing like cordial acts of friendship for oiling the machinery of international politics, and in affairs of State as in private life friendship is most valuable when it does not depend upon formal agreements. The visit of the King and Queen to France has aroused pleasurable feelings of enthusiasm in both countries. It is one of the pleasant amenities of life. But journalists and others simply spoil the occasion when they begin to speculate about the political consequences or talk about a formal alliance. The blessing of friendship is that it extends to the whole of life and embraces all the arts of peace. The disadvantage of an alliance is that it concentrates attention on the possibility of combined warlike operations, and might commit us by obligations of honour to military intervention in a quarrel which we believed to be unjust. Against such risky entanglements the conscience of the country must be on its guard. We do not believe, however, that there is any danger in this direction at the present moment.

* * *

It is good news that the French Government has accepted the proposal of Sir Edward Grey for an Anglo-French Conference upon the serious condition of affairs in the New Hebrides. We hope that this is one of the subjects upon which conversations have taken place during the past week. The break-down of civilised government in the New Hebrides under the Condominium reflects little credit on either of the partners.

"The whole history of the New Hebrides," the Rev. J. H. Harris writes in the Daily News and Leader, "has been a troubled one. The natives early learned to hate the white man for his evil deeds, but quickly assumed the habit of drinking his gin and of contracting his diseases. In 1887 civilisation endeavoured to institute an embryo administration, which, however, only unfurled the Tricolour and the Union Jack over confusion. In 1906 came the Convention between France and England, which provided Courts of Justice with judges who could neither understand each other's language nor converse with litigants or public prosecutor; Courts with a procedure partly English, partly French; Courts without any authority to enforce the penalties they imposed!"

"It is admitted," Mr. Harris continues, "by French authorities that slave trading has been re-established on the islands; it is denied by nobody that the illicit sale of drink, arms, and ammunition flourishes under the very eyes of the Resident Commissioners; whilst the relations between the 'administrative authorities' form the daily jest of planter and merchant, and in practice give carte blanche to every form of licence, chicanery, and crime."

This is the grave situation with which the English and French Foreign Ministers have to deal, and the best elements in both countries will, we hope, insist upon the duty of finding a satisfactory and honourable way out without a moment's unnecessary delay.

THE debate on the Welsh Church Bill in the House of Commons on Monday was rendered memorable by the very able speech of the Attorney-General. It is to the advantage of the country as a whole irrespective of party or religious opinion that the Nonconformist position should be presented with such intimate personal knowledge.

The demand for disestablishment, he said, could not be said to be due to any want of religious feeling in the Welsh people as a whole. There was no part of the United Kingdom where in the outward daily practice of religion they found so strong a flood of religious feeling constantly expressing itself as they did in Wales. He spoke with some little personal knowledge, as he was half a Welshman, and the whole of his youth was spent in the midst of the traditions of Welsh Nonconformity. English Churchmen did not altogether appreciate the intensity, the fervour, the universality with which the practice of religion in the home, in the Sunday school, in the preaching meeting really showed itself.

AMONG the chief characteristics of Welsh religious worship, Sir John Simon continued, were the universal practice of impromptu prayer, the emphasis put upon preaching, the open avowal of private religious experience, the immense fervour of religious enthusiasm, and the definite rejection of sacerdotal mediation. At the same time, the Welsh Nonconformist spoke with complete respect of the practice of the English Church. It was gross libel to say that the Welsh Nonconformist was a man who spent his time in abusing the Church of England. B the matter did not stop there. The whole national movement in Wales was essentially bound up with Nonconformity. The division, which could be traced back to about 1720, when the religious revival began, had led to such a separation between the Welsh national spirit on the one hand and the Established Church on the other, that it was perfectly idle to suppose that as long as that national spirit remained it was going to find itself naturally represented by the Established Church. Where else in the civilised world, he asked, should we find an Established Church whose only claim was that it represented a minority of the population?

THE Report of the Board of Education for 1912-13 contains interesting particulars of the provision made for elementary education, special attention being devoted to the subject of the training of teachers. Since 1890, 9,414 places have been added to the accommodation in training colleges, and there has been steady growth in the removal of religious disabilities. The number of places available for candidates irrespective of their religious belief in 1880 was only 500. In 1890 it had risen to 839. It is now 10,657. There are now 19,100 public elementary schools in England with accommodation for 6,399,809 scholars. Of these 7,140 are council and 11,960 voluntary schools. Ten years ago the number of Council schools was 5,049 and of voluntary 13,438. The number of children on the registers was 5,588,545, and the percentage of average attendance was 88.86. The shortage in the supply of teachers has apparently reached a very critical stage. Hitherto the profession has been recruited chiefly through the pupil teacher system. The number of young people who are seeking to qualify in this way has diminished from 11,018 in 1906-7 to 4,486 in 1912-13.

WE congratulate the Baptist denomination most heartily on the completion of their £250,000 fund in order to raise the salaries of all their qualified ministers to a minimum. This remarkable feat has been accomplished in two years in a constituency where there is little wealth on a large scale, and an unusual number of small village churches. The Rev. J. H. Shakespeare has been its organising genius.

"There have been a number of large gifts," he says, "but the secret of our success has been in the universality of the response. There is scarcely a Baptist Union Church in England which has not taken part in the effort. For instance, Yorkshire, which leads the way in county contributions, has only three small churches which have not joined."

* * *

THE Open Letter of the Bishop of Oxford on "The Basis of Anglican Fellowship," to which we call attention in our leading article to-day, seems more likely to arouse controversy than to allay anxiety and provide a rallying point for distracted minds. Already the columns of the Times are beginning to bristle with replies. The Dean of Salisbury makes the pertinent observation that if time has justified the Bishop against the men who once accused him of dangerous heresy the same is likely to happen in the case of the unorthodox opinions which he in his turn is so anxious to condemn. Canon Sanday, after intimating that he has a longer answer in preparation, writes:—"I must needs think that there are many things in the Bishop's open letter which ought not to have been written. In particular his attack upon the sincerity of those who differ from him is (to use his own word) quite 'unjustifiable.' He might at least have considered that there are different kinds of sincerity, and that one kind may conceivably conflict with another. But I hope to show that the kind which the Bishop demands is subject to much deduction, and that those whom he blames are not really blameable. There are other points which he has by no means thought out to the bottom, and I must needs think that he was wrong to pronounce upon them so dogmatically. I do not for a moment myself question the Bishop's orthodoxy. But I think he should have seen that the two letters in your columns of which he complains were little more than half serious. I will take it upon myself to say that they were just meant as a reminder that he too is mortal. The reminder was needed—and it has been wholly disregarded."

THE Times itself, while paying a warm tribute to Dr. Gore's character and personal influence, dissociates itself very plainly from the conclusions of the Open Letter, and marks with grave regret its clerical tone, its disregard of the place of the laity in the Church, and the suggestion that different standards of belief are required of the clergy and the laity. That Dr. Gore is led to these clerical extremes by the logic of the position to which he has committed himself, rather than by the religious instincts of his own heart, is, we think, made plain in one self-revealing sentence: "For my own part, I may say in passing, if I am to judge by the fruits of religion as I see them in life, I should be disposed to rank the Friends among the highest in the Kingdom of God, and they have no ministry and no sacraments." But surely this confession blows his whole scheme of a sacerdotal order, endowed with exclusive and supernatural control of the highest grace of the Gospel, to the winds. If God is "not tied to His sacraments" as he admits, and works wonders of grace without them, the whole position, so far from being Catholic, becomes a particularly perverse form of sectarianism.

WE are sorry to see that the movement for imposing military training upon all University students is again raising its head at Cambridge and receiving some encouragement at the public schools. Thus Mr. Nowell Smith, the Headmaster of Sherborne, pleads that it is desirable to make military training, like a certain modicum of English, mathematics, &c., a normal part of the curriculum leading to a university degree. We entirely agree with Mr. A. C. Benson when he deprecates the suggestion as a feudal reaction and an interference with liberty. "There may be justification," he says, "for a national system of military training, but I believe that it is the business of a university to offer an education with just as much discipline as may preserve order and regularity. I do not believe it is our business to introduce an element of military training into this. If I were a parent, and my son showed a taste for such things, I should do my best to encourage him. But if my son were not so inclined, I would certainly not send him to a university where such a compulsion existed."

THERE will be considerable disappointment that there is on the whole no sign of any diminution in Poor Law expenditure in spite of Old Age Pensions and the Insurance Act. A correspondent of the Manchester Guardian points out that though no statistics will be available until the Local Government Board issues the usual returns next year, it is known that in many districts the demands made by boards of guardians are higher this year than last, or as high. This is due partly to the larger amount spent on outdoor relief. Old Age Pensions have raised the standard of comfort and made it necessary to give better relief to the people who remain on the books. There has also been a generous increase in the scale of outdoor relief to widows and children. Another reason is to be found in improved methods of administration, especially on the medical side, where hospitals are better equipped and more adequately staffed. Much of this can be justified as socially profitable. At the same time there is need for keen watchfulness, for nothing is easier than for boards of guardians to let large sums of money slip through their fingers with no adequate return in human welfare.

"THUS FAR, AND NO FARTHER."

It is a long time since we have come across such a curious and inconsistent piece of special pleading as the Open Letter which the Bishop of Oxford has addressed to the clergy of his diocese. There is not a page of it which does not lay him open to the damaging retort of the clever controversialist. This is a task, however, for which we have little inclination. Personal respect for Dr. Gore and many debts in the past to his religious teaching would dispose us to silence rather than the expression of strong disagreement, were it not for the magnitude of the issues involved, and an instinctive distrust of every attempt to set limits to freedom just at the point where our own liberties are secure.

The Letter deals with many topics. It warns Anglicans of the danger of religious co-operation with Nonconformists. It pleads for a sacramental view of the rite of confirmation. It lays down very definite High Church principles which must be maintained "even at the price of much isolation and much limitation in the area of our work." But the passages which are likely to arouse most attention are those dealing with the obligations of clerical subscription and the very direct and incisive attack made upon the honour of the liberal clergy. With the plea for the acceptance of words and phrases in the creeds in their plain historical meaning many of our readers will be in close agreement. Without making themselves the judge of another man's conscience they know that they could not conform without insincerity. But if an attack is to be delivered from inside the Church it must be by one whose own orthodoxy is above suspicion, who himself accepts everything in its plain meaning without resort to the unreal use of traditional language which he condemns in others. Unfortunately Dr. GORE is very far from being in this case. No sooner has he brought the heavy guns of honour and truthfulness to bear upon his brethren who do not believe in the Virgin Birth or a physical Resurrection than he proceeds to excuse himself for not believing in a literal

"descent into hell" or in the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed. In an article on "Symbolism in Religion" in the Constructive Quarterly for March, to which he refers for a fuller statement of his views, he says quite plainly, "In many spheres of Christian language and in certain articles of the Creed, the symbolical principle must be admitted: the language is true symbolically and not literally." On this principle he tells us that the phrase 'He descended into hades' is symbolic "because it uses the language of physical descent which is derived ultimately from the idea that the ghosts of the dead are under the earth in a pit." Similarly in regard to the Ascension:—

"It seems to me that when CHRIST 'ascended into the heavens' physically and actually, He was expressing in visible form a certain spiritual idea—namely, His exaltation to the Father's throne. We of to-day know that heaven is not really a locality above our heads, more clearly no doubt than the first disciples who were witnesses of the event knew it; but still for us and always, the idea of moral glory or moral failure must be expressed in local phrases, by the words 'up' or 'down,' 'higher' or 'lower.'"

All this is very interesting, and it is probably the only way in which this ancient language can be adapted for use by the modern mind. But it is gloss, explanation, some blunt people will call it "explaining away," in face of an obvious difficulty; and it comes strangely from the lips of a man who feels bound to make damaging charges of insincerity against his fellow-clergy, when they do not agree with him in regard to the extent to which this far-reaching principle may be applied.

But of course Dr. GORE has reasons for the hardihood with which he seeks to bind and loose, though we cannot believe that they will have any force except for clerical minds built exactly like his own.

(1) He seeks to establish a broad difference between "the Old Testament as prophecy and the New Testament as fulfilment in fact." This enables him to recognise a large element of legend and myth in the Old Testament. "The preparatory revelation," he tells us, "can be given as well in myth and legend and poetry and quasi-philosophical inquiry and moral tale as in the simple record of historical fact." We agree. But when he argues that this is consistent with "unfeigned belief in all the Canonical Scriptures," or maintains that the influence of religious imagination must be left out of account in the study of the New Testament on the ground that it is "a simple record of historical fact," we feel that he is not facing the problem at all, but only finding excuses to suit the occasion.

(2) Parallel to this greater freedom which is to be allowed in the study of the Old Testament is the distinction between a true and a false kind of criticism.

"I have always been jealous," he writes, "on behalf of the freedom of literary and historical criticism, strictly so-called, in its application to the Bible, both the Old and the New Testament. There is a criticism, falsely so-called, which is bound by its presuppositions to explain away anything miraculous in the Bible. But there is a criticism which is really open-minded and really historical. It has largely reconstructed for us our ideas of the literature of the Old Testament and thrown a vast amount of valuable light upon the New Testament."

This is a familiar and a very unworthy argument. If it has any meaning at all apart from its rhetorical emphasis, it must be intended to suggest that trained scholars are only "really open-minded and really historical" when they agree in the main with Dr. GORE, and that when they arrive at other conclusions they either garble the evidence or are the victims of their own prejudices. We find it hard to believe that Dr. GORE is ignorant of the modern study of the New Testament as never to have read an unprejudiced book with which he does not agree, or never to have met noble-hearted scholars who have felt compelled to reject the historicity of certain miracles, it may even be against their religious inclination on the ground of evidence alone. It is surely only a momentary lapse from the comity of sound learning, which has led him to feed the prejudices of the most ignorant of his clergy with this tale about criticism which is only open-minded and historical when it reaches to foregone conclusions of conventional opinions.

(3) But Dr. GORE is wise enough to seek for some safer ground than the two reasons we have mentioned. He appeals to episcopal authority to determine just how far new interpretations may go. In several passages of his Open Letter he alludes the pious opinion of the Bishops of the Southern Province, as though that ought to close the case of conscience so far as the clergy are concerned. The fact that the Convocation of Canterbury has expressed a wish to append an explanatory note or interpretation to the "damnatory clause" of the Athanasian Creed is cited by him as a justification for his own lack of complete and sincere acceptance of the words in their natural meaning. He is anxious for a formal episcopal pronouncement, a solemn repudiation of heresy, at the present time, and presumably whenever in the future a similar crisis in theological thought may arise. Now leaving on one side the lack of theological eminence in the bench of bishops as a whole, this attempt to centralise the authority of the Church in its officers is one fraught with the gravest possible danger to religious liberty. By a logical momentum, which it would be impossible to resist, it would degenerate rapidly into a doctrine of episcopal infallibility and a system of discipline in which slavish and mechanical obedience would become the first of clerical virtues. It is to this issue that the Tractarian movement, with its innate distrust of spiritual freedom, is working itself out. Perhaps it is the only course for the clericalists to pursue who have set themselves "to convert a Protestant-minded country." That, according to the Bishop of Oxford, is the object which they have in view. His Open Letter is thus less an eirenicon for troubled times than a clerical war-cry in the interest of stringency and exclusiveness, and of a PRIDE'S Purge of all the heretics in the ministry, whose new thought or need of accommodation in the use of language is in excess of his own.

Fortunately, however, the High Church clergy have no power to dominate the religious situation, and in the Church of England itself the final word does not lie with them. Scholars will still pursue their quiet and fearless way. Men and women working together in the world will grow in tolerance and mutual understanding. The sand-castles of episcopal dreams will sink and disappear before the rising tide of the Spirit. And even the Bishop of Oxford may discover that there is more of the grace and truth of the Christian religion in his friendship with Non-conformists than in the inexorable ecclesiastical logic which forbids him to be friendly except on strictly limited terms.

NIGHT.

By P. E. VIZARD, F.R.A.S.

WE often hear it stated as a fact that certain things could never be known or even exist apart from their opposites; for example, that good could not exist without evil, pleasure without pain, harmony without discord, light without darkness. Whether this is so or not I am not prepared to say. But, confining attention for a moment to the last point—light and darkness—whether or not without the night we could ever have the day, this at least seems certain, that if there were no night we should never have known the wonders revealed by the starry heavens; we should never have had a science of astronomy. This thought is nowhere more beautifully expressed than in Blanco White's sonnet on "Night and Death," which has been described as the finest sonnet in our language.

Mysterious Night! When our first parent knew
Thee from report divine, and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,
Hesperus with the host of heaven came,
And lo! creation widened in man's view.
Who could have thought such darkness lay concealed Within thy beams, O Sun! or who could find,
While fly and leaf and insect stood revealed,
That to such countless orbs thou mad'st us blind!
Why do we then shun Death with anxious strife?
If light can thus deceive, wherefore not Life?

And, to touch a still deeper and more spiritual note, we may quote in this connection from one of the immortal sermons of F. W. Robertson ("Jacob's Wrestling") :—"There is a sense in which darkness has more of God than light has. He is approached more nearly in that which is indefinite than in that which is definite and distinct. He is felt in awe, and wonder, and worship, rather than in clear conceptions. Moments of tender, vague mystery often bring distinctly the feeling of His presence. When day breaks and distinctness comes the Divine has evaporated from the soul like morning dew. It is true, even literally, that the darkness reveals God. Every morning God draws the curtain of the garish light across His eternity, and we lose the Infinite. We look down on earth instead of up to heaven, on a narrower and more contracted spectacle—that which is examined by the microscope when the telescope is laid aside—smallness, instead of vastness. 'Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening'; and in the dust and pettiness of life we seem to cease to behold Him; then at night He undraws the curtain again and we see how much of God and Eternity the bright distinct day has hidden from us."

The beauty, the calm, the magical influence, the restorative power of the night are felt in some degree by all, and beautiful passages without number in our literature attest what a source of inspiration the night and the starry heavens have been. The great philosopher Kant said, "Two things strike me dumb; the starry heavens above and the moral law within." But perhaps of all the feelings evoked by the night and the stars, especially to those doomed to endure the rush and turmoil of great cities, the chief is that of calm. Goethe has the fine saying, "Like a star, without haste, yet without rest, let each one revolve round his own task." Emerson says, "If a man would be alone, let him look at the stars." And Matthew Arnold, in his poem "Self-dependence," sings :—

And a look of passionate desire
O'er the sea and to the stars I send :
Ye who from my childhood up have calm'd me,
Calm me, ah, compose me to the end !
"Ah, once more," I cried, "ye stars,
ye waters,
On my heart your mighty charm renew ;
Still, still let me, as I gaze upon you,
Feel my soul becoming vast like you."

Again, what teacher is there like the stars to enforce the lesson of man's littleness—to humble man's pride? And here, of course, the familiar words come to mind, "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man, that thou visitest him?"

In Tennyson's "Epilogue" we have :—

The fires that arch this dusky dot—
Yon myriad-worlded way—
The vast sun-clusters gathered blaze,
World-isles in lonely skies,
Whole heavens within themselves, amaze
Our brief humanities.

Then, again, to take the opposite side of the picture, what subject more illustrates the dignity and greatness of man? Dwellers as we are on this tiny globe—this "dusky dot"—a mere grain of sand in view of the mighty orbs around us, and yet to have pried with magnificent daring into the secrets of the universe; to have made not only our globe, but other bodies millions upon millions of miles distant, deliver us the secret of their distance, density, weight, composition; and even to have aspired to guess at their birth, the stages of their growth, and their death—in view of all this, what mighty factors are the mind and imagination of man! How much more cause have we, in this day, than Hamlet had in his day, as we look on "this brave o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire," to exclaim, "what a piece of work is a man, how noble in reason, how infinite in faculties, . . . in apprehension how like a god!"

Another thought suggested by the night is what an "illusion" the sky is! Life is full of illusions. In no department is this more true than in Astronomy, where the sense of sight is continually at fault. Constantly is the truth of Longfellow's line brought home to us, "things are not what they seem." For example, the heavenly bodies appear to move across the sky; whereas the movement is really with us. The sun and moon appear to be about the same size; in reality it would take about fifty million moons to make one sun. The stars (other than planets) appear to be "fixed," as regards their relative positions; whereas they are really moving at enormous rates of speed. The sun and moon when near the horizon appear to be larger than when at their highest points; and yet, when they are at the horizon they are really much further away than when overhead. When the disc of the sun or moon appears to be just above the horizon, either at sunrise or sunset, it is really, on account of the refraction of light, just below the horizon.

Similarly we have the illusion of the "sky." It is difficult to get rid of the idea that, if we were to ascend high enough, we should strike our heads against a roof of more or less solid substance. This was obviously the thought of the ancients, as reference to a few passages in the Bible will show. The sky, called the "firmament" or "heaven," was thought to be a solid dome in which the stars were stuck (see Gen. i. 7, 14) and from which they might fall in showers on to the earth (Matt. xxiv. 29; Rev. vi. 13). This roof was supported by pillars (Job xxvi. 11), windows in it were opened to let the rain through, which was stored in reservoirs above it (Gen. i. 7, vii. 11; 1 Kings viii. 35; Job xxxviii. 37). Such material figures were also used as a "curtain" or "tent" (Isa. xl. 22); "vesture" (Heb. i. 12); "scroll" (Rev. vi. 14).

And, though we moderns know so much better, the illusion still haunts us. We feel the force of Tom Hood's lines:—

The fir trees dark and high;
I used to think their slender tops
Were close against the sky.

We hardly realise as we look up that the "sky" does not really exist—that we are simply looking through a blue medium right away into infinite space.

The necessary demands of sleep, combined with the natural sluggishness of our nature, sadly hinder us from taking advantage of what the night has to give us. A hasty and casual glance is all that is usually gained. The real way to experience the wonder and beauty of the night is to indulge the habit practised by enthusiasts of the "open air" system of "sleeping out"; only you must not, of course, sleep too well! The writer has had one or two wonderful experiences of this sleeping out in summer nights, and can strongly recommend the experiment, if not from a sanatory or pleasurable, at least from an astronomical point of view. Instead of a momentary glance from the street or some place where a star-gazer attracts attention, you recline in comfort on your camp-bed or mattress, and, screened from view, you can take a long steady gaze upon these pure and radiant orbs. You witness the grand and stately march of the constellations, hour by hour, over the vault above you; familiar friends, usually seen only on winter nights, greet your sight; gazing intently, you seem to feel the influence of the stars sinking into you; and then, long before you expect it, the dawn begins, the loveliest sight of all: light summer clouds in the east catch the golden glow of the sunrise long before the monarch himself appears, and the varying forms of cloud and constant change of hue and colour exhibit a scene of varying beauty that no words could adequately paint.

Morn in the white wake of the morning star

Came furrowing all the orient into gold. Then the stars gradually pale, the lesser lights going first, till two or three of the giants only are left; and at last the morning star—a brother or sister planet—alone remains, sole herald of the approach of their mighty sire, the Sun.

And then how refreshing is the stillness of the night, what Milton beautifully calls "the soft silence of the list'ning night."

It is strange to contemplate our subject as affecting the denizens of worlds (if such there be) illuminated by two, three, or even four suns, for such systems are known to exist. It would seem that the inhabitants of such worlds would never have sight of the starry heavens, and perhaps would know not sleep. For them would be realised the ideal of the writer of the Book of Revelation of a world of which it could be said "There shall be no night there." This, however, in view of what we have said of the night, were hardly "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

CINEMAS AND THE CHILD.

It has been said that the kinematograph (usually called the "cinema") has come to stay, and what cannot be cured must be endured. The kinematograph is irresistible; organise the kinematograph. These are the popular notions in respect of this latest achievement of science. It may be well, therefore, to consider its effects upon the life of the present generation. Every class of society seems to be affected by it; but it is among the working-classes that the boom is most apparent. Age and youth are alike fascinated by the "moving pictures." However the "cinema" may be regarded, it cannot take the place of the drama. The "show" is but the ghost of a play. The voice is wanting, and the action is carried on in an atmosphere of unreality. The audience knows such things cannot happen as they are frequently represented, but we are told the audience is amused, and as amusement is the object of "cinemas" we should say nothing against them. The fact is that this form of amusement is popular because it is new and cheap. The surroundings are made as pleasant as possible—even the darkness is an attraction to some. "I went," says Mr. Filson Young, "to a glittering palace the other day and sat for two hours, during which time I saw, amongst other things, no fewer than four so-called domestic dramas, all exactly on the same convention and pattern, and three of them on the same plot; all of them, moreover, of a vacancy and sodden sentimentality which I have no power to describe. The film merchants are quite right to avoid impropriety; but why should they not also avoid this kind of mopping and mowing imbecility, which I honestly believe to be worse in the long run than frank impropriety?"

Those who regard these "pictures" with suspicion think their boom is transitory, that it is only a passing phase of the desire to be amused. But the evil has not yet been realised, more especially in respect of its effect on child life. The sense of impression on the mind is lasting. The headmaster of Eton recently observed: "I am convinced that the cinematograph has potentialities of almost unbounded mischief if left unchecked." Such an opinion from Dr. Lyttelton cannot be passed over. He understands child life; he knows how the young are easily influenced for good or for evil, how susceptible of impressions they are. On the quivering screen a child sees sights which lure him to a world of unreality. For, be it remembered, these "pictures"—or, at least, many of them—have been produced under entirely artificial surroundings. They are seen in "mum" show, for the accompanying music may be regarded as entirely foreign to the "pictures." The living voice is absent. We are promised an electrically worked contrivance of the gramophone type whereby the artists' voices may be heard exactly as the movements on the screen are seen. But "pictures" are not persons; they are not flesh and blood, whose actions are, to say the least, real actions, and arising from real life. Here, as it has been observed: "The plot is subservient to incidents which are exaggerated for the sake of sensation, depicting rolling eyeballs, murders, and long drawn-out death agonies, altogether out of that proportion so necessary to good drama. As for the comedies, the more ridiculous and absurd they are, and the less witty, the better they go down."

We believe the effect of these "pictures" in early life upon the mind and character is prejudicial in every respect. Through one avenue of the senses there are produced thoughts of such a nature that every lover of truth must regard them with abhorrence. Lurid dramas of crime, revenge, and sexual passions are reeled out before the eyes of young children who are for the moment dazed and fascinated. As is well known to every psychologist, the perception of children is remarkably keen, and they intuitively grasp the meaning of many of the scenes placed before them. Yet much is entirely alien to child nature, which happily cannot understand the innuendos and suggestions so frequently witnessed at these shows. At the same time, it must be remembered that the impressions, even when they are not understood, are indelibly impressed upon the vision. It may be said that if the films are properly selected the danger is reduced to a minimum. But, thus far, the censorship has been utterly inadequate, and, indeed, as it is carried out at present, is of little use. We believe there is at this moment a committee at work under the honorary secretaryship of Mr. Alfred Percival Graves, late H.M. Inspector of Schools, who is endeavouring to bring about some arrangement which it is thought may make it impossible to use films other than educational. But even here we are on difficult ground, for no hard and fast line can be drawn, and the standard must vary according to the ideals of the censors.

Recently, in the Lower House of Convocation, Canon Rawnsley moved: "That this House notes with thankfulness that the Education Authorities of Liverpool, Birmingham, Blackburn, and other towns, together with the Educational Authorities of Lancashire and Cumberland, have taken steps in co-operation with the justices to regulate the attendance of elementary scholars at cinematograph halls in the best interests of education, character and health—and it would respectfully urge all educational and licensing authorities in the Northern province to give the matter of like regulation their serious consideration." This is a step in the right direction, but it is not sufficient. Children are prohibited, we will say, until the age of fourteen, but the prohibition only serves as an advertisement for the caterers of the cinemas, one of whom recently announced a film as "A Bargain for the Devil, 3,000 ft. long, thrilling, sensational wonderful; a film for adults, not for children under fourteen." Naturally every child over fourteen may regard himself as an adult, which would also be considered highly complimentary to the juvenile. The age limit alone is not satisfactory; the films themselves must not be of questionable morality. If there is an appeal to the lower passions there is danger, and such films should not be allowed to be exhibited at all.

If the opinions expressed by young children were not true, they would be intensely ludicrous. "I don't want to go," said one who had visited a cinema; "there's too much silly cuddling." Said another child relating her experience, "Lions eating bodies was awful." The present writer has visited cinema shows for the purpose of seeing the effects of the "pictures" on children. The result varies greatly. Some are evidently accustomed to the film, others are perplexed and do not know what to make of them. For educational purposes they are of little value—one sense, that of sight, gets wearied and unable to mentally realise the rapidly flitting scenes. And whatever is gained is dissipated by the effect on the mind which, for some time, is unhinged, so to speak, and rendered unable to recover the attack of mental dyspepsia. A writer in the Spectator, speaking of the educational value (?) of the kinematograph, imagines the spirit of Matthew Arnold driving the fascinated children out of the darkness. We need another apostle of "sweetness and light"; we need men who will not equivocate when danger is present, who will express clearly their approval or disapproval of the picture palace.

OUR VILLAGE.

II.

"A LARGE and venerable village, with a single street struggling along a high bank"—so a foreigner describes our village. And one has told how our river "frets in its rocky bed to race afterwards beneath a one-arched bridge," while another respectfully beheld it glide "deep and sullen past the eastern portion of the churchyard, its swift waters silent as if they held respect unto the dead."

In sinuous curves, enfolding the meadows like a caressing arm, flows the stream whose immemorial murmur marks the passing of the years. It flows so close to the church that it has several times encroached upon the burial-ground, but now a stout wall curbs the curiosity of its waters. "Mynwent"—a "place of remembrance"—the Welsh folk call God's acre, where the weary sleep after life's fitful fever, just beneath the shadow of the Norman tower with the mediæval and Roman relics embedded in its walls. One of these relics, which served for generations as a stile to the churchyard, has a carved inscription holding the briefest of all human documents, just three words. In Roman capitals it gives a daughter's name. "Velvor filia Broho." That is all. Somebody's lassie that laughed and pulled her father's beard in a forgotten day. Of what race, of what century was this daughter of Broho? What kind of pilgrimage found a goal in this Welsh hamlet in the long ago? What strange circumstance brought a Teutonic maid, if such was she, to find a resting-place, perhaps in the fifth century or earlier, among an alien people? Was she but a babe, or had she reached the years of romance, perchance of saddened wisdom? Nothing known, save that she was. She breathed, she stood in the sun; and the waters of the Teify have sung a lullaby to her long sleep, in which twice-seven centuries have passed as a dream of the night. Near where I sit beneath the ancient yew is another memorial stone of another daughter. You will read the tale of Peter's child in two lines. She was three years old, and was drowned in the Teify. I well remember the tragic occurrence. Some children were playing on the river bank, and this wee tot reached down to gather a flower, and while the laughing prattle was on her lips she fell in and the stream carried her away. All day long they sought for her in the pools that lay in the miles below. Work had ceased, all villagers who could help were searching the stream for the valueless thing which is so valuable at such times, but not till the dusk began to close upon a brilliantly-agonising autumn day was the search successful. They placed her in his arms, the father's arms, and never was body held as that cold and wet little form was fondled, and no love-talk ever so honied as those broken-hearted endearments poured into unheeding ears. Nothing will wipe out the picture of that man coming back to his desolate home, carrying a pale little burden, while the crowd fell back in silent and awe-stricken sympathy.

Both father and mother have now followed the child. Quiet enough they lie close to the river that scarred their love with cicatrice of such deep sorrow; but the same river sings that sorrow's hymn of solace. Sweet is all its music on this April Sabbath morn. But a while since the valley resounded with the melodious changes pealing from the belfry; and now the sweeter sounds of human voices blended in psalms of praise conjure a throbbing soul within the shrine. The swish of the breeze in the old yew, the rush of the river, the harmonious sound of holy songs lend a new meaning to the sadness of the human story suggested by the slabs and pillars around. It is Palm Sunday, or "Flower Sunday," which the Welsh folk consecrate to the remembrance of the dead. The graves are trimmed, and plants and flowers bedeck the mounds that separate their sleep from our sadness. And if, as drawn in Maeterlinck's play, the dead wake up whenever they are called to mind, they must be more than ever present and alert around this ancient yew to-day. Many here lie with whom I played in childhood, many whose hands I grasped, whose eyes lit up in answer to mine own—and the river sweeps on still towards the sea, the yew listens to the message of the wandering wind, and a new generation sings the ancient psalms. Of yore I sang beneath those choir rafters a creed I no longer love, but mingled with the wind and the river and the thoughts of the dead, it is only its sweetness I hear this hour, only the heart's broken accents and the eternal answer from out of the heart of God. The earth is full of graves, yet never so full as the hearts of men, but in that earth to-day laughing flowers lift up faces to the sun, unbent beneath the tread of the festive dead, while Christ is riding in triumph on to the City of God.

THE INCREASE IN THE NATIONAL DRINK BILL.

SIR,—Clerical errors will occur in even editorial notes. Mr. G. B. Wilson, Secretary of the U.K. Alliance, stated in his annual report "Social reformers will learn with regret that there has been an increase during 1913 of over £5,000,000 in the drink bill of the United Kingdom. I estimate the actual expenditure in 1913 at £166,681,000. This is an increase of £5,128,000 over the figures of 1912. Spirits show an increase of £1,997,000, or an increased consumption of 1,267,000 gallons; beer, £3,007,000, or an increase of 1,002,000 standard barrels, and wine, £118,000, or an increased consumption of 131,000 gallons." The above can scarcely unduly elate anyone.—Yours, &c.,

[We are indebted to our correspondent for his correction of the printer's error in the reference to Mr. G. B. Wilson's annual letter in our Notes last week. £5,000 should, of course, have been £5,000,000.—ED. OF INQUIRER.]

SUSTENTATION FUND APPEAL.

SIR,—I shall be glad if you will allow me one more appeal, especially to readers in Wales, who are likely to be interested in the completion of the Fund. A gentleman, who wishes to remain anonymous, has sent me a cheque for £50 with the condition that another £200 be subscribed in Wales. The time is getting short, but I do hope this will appeal to a sufficient number of possible donors to induce them to respond and enable me to pay in the cheque to the credit of the Fund.—Yours, &c.,

SECONDARY SCHOOLS OPEN TO BOYS AND GIRLS.

SIR,—The principles underlying the practice of Co-education having been presented in your issue of March 28, possibly some of your readers may care to know of a treatise giving a fair-minded presentation of the experience of some 70 English mixed secondary day-schools: "La Co-education dans les Ecoles Secondaires," by Dr. G. F. Burness, West Ham Secondary School, Stratford, London, E. (Lille, 1912). As the result of 15 years' experience Dr. Burness favours co-education, but reports frankly certain difficulties in practical working, especially in arranging the time table to suit the curricula for either sex. As regards similar Scotch schools, articles appeared in Women's Employment, March 20, April 3, 1914. It may not be generally known that there are at least 260 schools in England on the efficient list of the Board of Education, and 220 State-aided schools in Scotland, where boys and girls are instructed together in some or all subjects up to school leaving age. The majority of these schools have been founded in the last ten years, and for reasons of economy and to secure enough pupils for proper class grading they are to be found, as a rule, north of the Thames. A Bibliography of Co-education in Europe and the U.S.A. can be consulted at the library of the British Institute of Social Service, 1, Central-buildings, Tothill-street, Westminster. The only essay which deals with the social economic benefits of the system to the community in less populated areas is to be found in the periodical Frauen Bildung, numbers 8, 9, and 10, of 1913, published by Teubner, Berlin.

Since the year 1910 girls have been permitted to attend the boys' Mittelschulen of Prussia wherever there might be room available, and in 1912 25,000 girls were availing themselves of the opportunity in the smaller towns. In France girls are permitted to attend the boys' Lycées for mathematics and science. In Italy practically all State-aided schools are open to boys and girls. For further details as to Italy see Women's Employment, February 20, 1914. May not one cause of the prevalence of nervous breakdown in women teachers be that girls are not usually granted as much opportunity for fresh air and exercise as that which boys enjoy? The remedy for this would seem to train boys to take their fair share of the indoor work of the home. For example, the boys in the elementary schools of Derbyshire are taught that it is not unmanly to help in the home, and they are trained at school how to do so in various ways.—Yours, &c.,

INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIAN PEACE UNION.

SIR,—On Sunday, August 24, 1913, the day after the closing of the 20th International Peace Congress at the Hague, a meeting was held in the French Protestant Church of that city, on the Christian aspects of the Peace Movement. Addresses were given by Dr. W. Evans Darby (England), Pastor Mohn (Switzerland), and Professor Allégret (France). At the close, a few of those present, representing, in addition to the three countries above named, Germany, Holland, Austria, and Scotland, agreed as to the desirability of forming an International Christian Peace Union.

The object of the Union will be to draw together Christians of different countries, who feel it their duty and privilege to labour and to pray for the establishment, especially in international relations, of the Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace. We recognise in Christianity the supreme ethical and spiritual force, availing to conquer the spirit of discord and violence in all human affairs; therefore we plead for its rule in every department of life. As the tide of Christian love rises, it sweeps away all that leads to violent and embittered conflict; it takes away "the occasions of all wars." We see, then, in Christianity the power to abolish militarism and every other form of violence. Believing that the highest form of patriotism would be to strive, in our respective countries, to bring more of this transforming power into their policy, and that this would make for the lasting good of the whole human race, we invite our fellow-Christians, especially such as have experienced something of the conquering power of faith in God, to unite with us in this effort.

It is surely the duty of Christians, like the Apostle Paul, to "turn the world upside down." The upside, at present, is blatant militarism, and Mammon worship, with the social iniquities and the unrest which follow them. The work of all who seek to be loyal to Christ should be to turn that side of modern civilisation down, and to bring up the opposite, to establish all that is meant by the love of God and our neighbour. Such labour will not be lost. As Lord Morley has said: "The world only grows better, even in the moderate degree (in which) it does grow better because people wish it should and take the right steps to make it better." God's time is always now. Let us, therefore, unite in a new effort, by prayer and by labour, for the leavening of international relations with the Christian spirit. We recognise that this is a part of the greater work of bringing the spirit of Christ into all human relations, and we desire to pursue our special object in no narrow or sectional spirit. But we believe the time is fully ripe for reviewing the international policy of so-called Christian lands, in the light of Christ, and initiating changes in that policy, where it is found to conflict with His law of love.

The greatness of the task might well dismay the strongest of us, apart from trust in the all-victorious power behind our small human efforts. Thus to such this power by prayer is one of the leading objects of the Union, while active work is another. We cordially invite our fellow-Christians to join the Union, trusting that we may all unite in the desire to be inspired and guided by the Spirit of God, the Spirit of righteousness, of life and love.

The first meeting of the British members of the Union is to be held in Liverpool during the National Peace Congress (June 9 and following days).—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH G. ALEXANDER
(Tunbridge Wells),
MARY L. COOKE (London),

JESUS CHRIST AND THE MODERN MIND.

Jesus in the Nineteenth Century and After. By Heinrich Weinel, D.D., and Alban G. Widgery, M.A. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 10s. 6d. net.

THIS volume—the joint production of a German scholar and an English one—is of quite exceptional interest and importance. It has been conceived on a very comprehensive plan, and gives a masterly survey of the views that have been expressed about Jesus during the last hundred years or so. It is not merely historical, descriptive and critical, but is a work of real constructive value, and is probably the first of its kind to be written from the distinctively Liberal Christian standpoint. We shall be much mistaken if it does not take its place as the standard book on the subject. The book embodies the answers which, during the period under consideration, have been given to the question which Jesus first put to the disciples: "Who do men say that I am?" Even then, as their answer showed, there was much difference of opinion in regard to him. Among the writers of the New Testament, too, various conceptions of him find expression—that of the first three Evangelists being different from the one given by John, and John's differing in many respects from Paul's. The diversity that began thus early has been multiplied a hundredfold and more since. It is a question, indeed, whether any two people have quite the same view of Jesus; in a very real sense he is all things to all men and a different thing to each one, and this volume reveals to some extent what he has been to men of all temperaments, states of culture, and occupations—not to theologians of conflicting schools only, but to philosophers, poets, novelists, dramatists, scientists, socialists and individualists, and even to vegetarians and temperance reformers; not only what he has been to those who loved him, but to those who hated him; not only to those who called him Lord and God and regarded him as perfect man, but to those who looked upon him as a fanatic, an epileptic, or a degenerate. In a word, we have in this book the best and the worst that has been said about him. Has any other being that ever lived given rise to so many contradictory estimates of his character and teaching, or had his authority claimed by controversialists on both sides of so many questions? From the recollection of all this we gain at least an impression of the enormous significance which Jesus has for the world.

The nineteenth century was in a better position for gaining a true knowledge of him than any previous century had been; for it was during it that the new methods of study were applied to the Gospels, and it was seen that these Gospels are not homogeneous, as was once supposed, but consist of many elements that need to be sifted and to have their values decided before it can be known with any degree of accuracy what Jesus was and what he taught. It may be that even after all this laborious work upon the Gospels some points are still in doubt, but that is not unusual in the experience of those who study ancient documents and seek for knowledge of great historic figures. In reading this volume, one realises how often men's views of Jesus have been determined by their own peculiar character and circumstances. Thus, for Thomas Paine, who wrote at the time of the French Revolution, and helped so largely to bring that Revolution about, Jesus was a "virtuous reformer and revolutionist." Men have liked to see in Jesus the embodiment of their own ideals; and it is a tribute to his universality that they have so often found what they looked for. But he cannot have been like all the pictures that have been formed of him; there must be some representation that is nearer the reality than any other; and happily in these days of scientific study of the sources of information there is an increasing unanimity as to what that reality was. There is no reason to think that in the days to come Jesus will mean less for the world than he has meant in the past. The greater men's devotion to the things of the spirit, the more shall they feel their need of the grace and truth that dwelt in him. As the writers of this profoundly interesting book say: "Both Nature and good men besides Jesus may lead us to God. They who seek God with all their heart must, however, some day on their way meet Jesus."

LECTURES ON DRYDEN. By A. W. Verrall, Litt.D. Cambridge, at the University Press. 7s. 6d. net.

WHEN Dr. Verrall was appointed Professor of English Literature at Cambridge his friends hoped for much acute and illuminating criticism in a field where he was as learned and original as in the special Greek studies which are closely associated with his name. A single volume of lectures on Dryden, which never received the finishing touches from his own hand, is the pathetic memorial of these hopes. The subject will possibly strike some people as strange and wayward. Dryden as a man excites little personal enthusiasm, and his readers at the present time are few. The satire polished with fine literary art is out of fashion; religious poetry used as a political weapon is little to our taste; and the study of poetical technique, for which Dryden provides a field of incomparable richness, has few votaries. But just for this reason, we are glad that Dr. Verrall has given us this elaborate study of a writer who was a great artist in literary form instead of adding to our surfeit of essays upon popular poets. It must not be forgotten that Dryden has a conspicuous place in our literature. Gray in his "Progress of Poesy," mentions him with Shakespeare and Milton. According to Dr. Verrall, "Absalom and Achitophel" is the finest political poem that exists. Probably this literary distinction has been obscured by the endless controversies about Dryden's character, and the sincerity of his conversion to the Roman Catholic Church very soon after the accession of James II. Dr. Verrall has to admit that he is in no sense an heroic figure, but he is equally emphatic that many of the accusations made against him were unjust. "As regards his private conduct, he was certainly no model, but he gave no scandal, and even in that age, when scandal was not easily given, to avoid it meant something." This certainly is faint praise, but it is probably much nearer the truth than the stream of invective to which Bishop Burnet gave the prestige of his name. In regard to the conversion, after pointing out that it is not clear that personal interest of a mercenary kind was in any sense a determining factor, Dr. Verrall sums up as follows, "Considering the internal evidence of the two religious poems, Dryden is entitled to suspense of judgment; we cannot inspect his conscience."

WE are glad to welcome a new edition of A MODERN MYSTIC'S WAY, by W. Scott Palmer, in the familiar Roadmender Series (London: Duckworth & Co. 2s. 6d. net). It was published originally nine years ago, and the author, resisting the impulse to re-write, has simply given to it a touch of revision here and there, and added a few words of personal explanation in a new preface. These pages, we are told, "are intended especially to show how a person far from mystical—scientific, indeed, in bent of mind and education and driven to philosophy by intellectual thirst—may be affected by close intercourse with a profoundly mystical spirit living, in work-a-day fashion in this work-a-day world, the mystic life." We are now permitted to know that this contact of spirit, the vision of spiritual experience lived, came from the deep-souled woman who chose to be known as Michael Fairless. Her sacramental life of fellowship with the unseen through the wonder and beauty of the seen had a marvellous gift of communicating itself to others, and this book is the creation of her spirit mediated to us through the vital experience of another.

THE second volume of the Illustrated Edition of MACAULAY'S HISTORY (London: Macmillan & Co. 10s. 6d. net) is as excellent as the first. The reign of James II. coincides with the finest period of the engraved portrait, and the work of D. Loggan, J. Smith and W. Hollar has been largely drawn upon. There are in addition to the portraits numerous contemporary broadsides and caricatures. The eight plates in colour include Van Dyck's well-known picture of the children of Charles I. and Sir Godfrey Kneller's portrait of James II. We are sorry to see that the clumsy plan has been adopted of disregarding the division into volumes in the numbering of the pages. Vol. II. begins on page 517, and presumably Vol. III. will begin on page 1040. If it is intended to give only the page without the volume in the index—we note that this is so in the Illustrated Green which has been taken as a model—quite gratuitous difficulties will be put in the way of quick reference.

IN his new book, "Fresh Voyages on Unfrequented Waters," Dr. Cheyne brings fresh evidence in support of the heterodox views on the history of Israel with which his name has so long been associated. The new material of his book is said to be of exceptional interest, and is sure to attract considerable attention from supporters and opponents alike.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

WONDERFUL GIFTS.

LONG, long ago, when man was new in the world, and did not know much even about himself, he came grumbling to the Maker.

"O! Maker of Things," he said, "see this great bull and his horns, and that lion with his teeth and claws. It's not fair! How can I fight them? Why have not you given me horns and claws and great teeth?"

Then the Maker of all answered, "O Man! I have given you better things than horns and claws. Go and learn to use them."

The man went and thought. He saw branches broken off by the wind, and seizing the strongest he was better able to fight the wild beasts; he tied sharp stones to his strong staves, making deadly spears; he learned to make and use bows and arrows with which he could attack animals before they could get near him; he used his cunning to set snares for them. At last he felt himself master of all animals.

But he soon grumbled again.

"O! Maker of Things, you have been very unjust to me. The deer escape when I want them. Give me four legs like that horse instead of these two short ones."

But the Maker answered: "You have things better. Go and use them."

Then the man went, and with strips of the skin of an animal he had killed, he twisted bridle and reins, and caught the horse and rode him after the deer, and afterwards made him draw sledges.

He saw how the round logs rolled down hill, and bold boys balanced themselves on them for a ride. He hit on the secret of fixing a bar to the centre of the logs, so that they could still roll yet could be fastened together and a seat placed over them; and then, when he saw that round slices of logs would do as well as whole ones, he had made the first wheel. (That was the father-wheel of all our barrows and carts, cycles and motors, trams and trains, cranes and pulleys, clocks and watches, sewing and washing machines, in fact of every machine or engine in the whole world.)

Again he came grumbling.

"Am I to be frozen, O Maker of Things?" he asked. "Why can't I have wool all over me like the sheep, so that I need not fear the winter?"

"You may," said the great Maker, "if you will but use what you have."

Then the man went and wrapped himself in the skin of the sheep he had killed; but it was a clumsy garment, so he tried patiently until he had found out how to spin the wool into long threads and how to weave these into cloth, and so became the first of all our manufacturers of cotton and linen and wool and silk, and no longer feared rain nor frost nor snow.

But yet again he grumbled.

"O Maker of Things! you have treated me very badly. See the sharp teeth you have given the beaver that he can cut down trees. I can't do that."

But the Maker answered, "You can."

So the man, seeing sharp chisel-shaped flints like the beaver's teeth, took them in his hand, and found that by persevering he could cut down trees. You may see these flint knives and chisels and axes to-day in our museums. When he had found out how to make fire, and smelt iron, he made tools which would cut even stone.

Still he had not learnt to be content, and he soon came again.

"O Maker of Things! there's that sea! I want to find out what is on the other side of it. The birds go over it, and I want to. Give me wings like the bird or fins like the fish that I may cross the sea."

"Go and think," said the Maker.

So the man went and watched and thought. He saw how logs rode on the waves, and how the nautilus lifted up his sail that the wind might drive it along, and he shaped his logs like fishes, and gave them wings like birds to catch the wind, and he sailed over to the other side of the sea. And after he learned to make engines he went even without the wind.

But yet once more he grumbled.

"O Maker of Things! see how strong you have made the elephant. I can't lift heavy logs or stones, or I would build a great temple in which to worship you."

But the Maker answered, "O Man! you are stronger than the elephant if you will but use your head and your hands."

So the man made levers and cranes and pulleys which would lift more than the strongest elephant. And he built a great beautiful temple of mighty stones and carven wood, and in it he used his sweetest music to praise and thank the mighty Maker of all things everywhere.

"How wonderful are Thy works, O Lord!" he sang, "In wisdom Thou hast made them all. Thou hast made man a little lower than the angels, and hast given him dominion over the works of Thy hands." For at last he had learnt that man's brain and hands are greater gifts than any given to the animals. Thus, by using brain to guide hands, man has made weapons which will conquer any beast. He can travel faster than the swiftest horse, and can ride the stormiest seas. He has reached the ends of the earth, and has even managed to fly off it. He can weave clothes as warm as the sheep's fleece and as fine as the spider's web. He can move mountains and bind rivers and join seas, though God often reminds him that His might behind and over all is ever greater than all man's power.

Let us all, children of men, thank Him for these wonderful gifts, and strive that we may always think pure, right thoughts, guiding the hands to good, kind deeds.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

SIR EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE, BART.

THE announcement of the death of Sir E. Durning-Lawrence will be received with wide-spread regret. He had been in his usual good health till Saturday last, when he took a walk on Hampstead Heath. Later in the day he became ill, and sank so rapidly that he died early on Tuesday morning.

Sir Edwin, who was in his 78th year, was the youngest of four brothers, all now passed away, the sons of William Lawrence, who as a young carpenter came up from Cornwall to London many years ago. This enterprise proved the foundation of great fortunes; at first in Hoxton, and subsequently at a wharf on the Surrey side of Waterloo Bridge, the father's business as builder and contractor made rapid progress, and the Lawrence family has long been among the largest holders of real estate in the City of London. Mr. William Lawrence became an alderman of the City, and his son, Sir William Lawrence, not only attained the highest civic honours, becoming Lord Mayor, but represented the City in Parliament. Another son, similarly distinguished, was Sir James Clarke Lawrence, M.P. for Lambeth. Mr. Alfred Lawrence, the other brother, died at an earlier age, his son, the only surviving male representative of the family, being Mr. F. Pethick-Lawrence.

The youngest of the brothers enjoyed university education, and graduated B.A. and LL.B. in Honours at London. Becoming a barrister of the Middle Temple in 1867, Sir Edwin preferred politics to the law, and contested in turn, but unsuccessfully, E. Berks (1865), Haggerston (1866), and Burnley (1892). His persistence met with success at Truro (1895) as a Liberal Unionist, and he continued member for that division till 1906. He was created a baronet in 1898, assuming by licence the additional name of Durning in honour of his wife, Miss Edith Jane Durning Smith, younger daughter of Mr. John Benjamin Smith, formerly M.P. for Stockport. The marriage took place in 1874; there are no children. Sir Edwin was J.P. for Berkshire, his country residence being at King's Ride, Ascot.

The personal qualities of the deceased gentleman were partly known to a very wide circle. He did not hesitate to assume a conspicuous share of whatever business was going on about him. He took sides heartily, and the vigour of his expressions at times approached to vehemence. One would say he was not careful to dress his opinions to suit those around him; he rather laid himself open on occasion to their amused regret, and it would not be candid to deny that the feeling of some passed beyond that stage. But in his case, as in that of so many others, there were aspects of his nature which revealed themselves only to those who had closer dealings with him; a surprising gentleness would come into his tone and demeanour, and the thorough simplicity of his character shone through it all. His tastes were varied, and his own skill, which was of no mean order, rendered him truly appreciative of talent in many fields. Pictures were a special delight to him; a favoured friend might catch a sight of graceful sketches by his own brush. Music was also one of his pleasures, and here also he had long ago exhibited executive ability. His pen would doubtless have been more productive had circumstances allowed him a secluded life; as it is, the record shows him to have published a "History of Lighting from the Earliest Times," and "The Progress of a Century, or the Age of Iron and Steam." He was a great collector of books, especially of the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods; and a good many of his friends will remember the eagerness with which he brought forth one precious volume after another and displayed their peculiar features. All the world knows how warmly Sir Edwin espoused the side of the "Baconians," and it is pretty certain that with the general public he will be chiefly remembered as the author of "Bacon is Shakespeare," published in 1910. That he did not content himself with publications on the subject—one of his pamphlets is said to have reached a circulation of 300,000!—is also well known. Although he had attained an age when most men would excuse themselves from personal exertion, he valiantly undertook a series of popular lectures, illustrated by the lantern, to prove his contention as to the authorship of the Shakespeare plays; and we must conclude that these and his many other labours unsuspectingly sapped a physical energy which appeared exuberant. His juvenility, indeed, not only surprised, but at times perplexed his friends; what would he say and do next?

But all these things, his foibles and his endeavours, were but a supplement to the main current of his life, which flowed deeply, broadly, and continually, in ceaseless benevolence. The world may think of him as the pamphleteer, and perhaps he would have preferred it so; but he will be remembered among Unitarians as a philanthropist, and chiefly as a munificent supporter of the religious movement to which he and his family were so deeply attached. His charities, indeed, as became a good Unitarian, extended far beyond the bounds of a sect. Deeply attached to University College School, where he was educated, he gave time and money without stint to promote its welfare, and long served as chairman of its committee. Another great public institution, Waterloo Hospital, mourns in him a faithful friend; and thus the list goes on. In our own circle, Sir Edwin's beneficence has been probably unparalleled. He was a Trustee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and it is no secret that he had been invited more than once to be its President. To the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, he gave very generously; the settlement of the College at Summer-ville was largely due to his support. The London District Unitarian Society, founded by the Lawrence family along with other zealous friends, has always been greatly helped by them; Sir Edwin, like his brother Sir James, had been its President. To the Permanent Chapel Building Fund, the Ministers' Pension Fund, the Sustentation Fund, and other beneficent institutions he contributed invaluable aid. As to the churches, chapels, schools, &c., that he has helped to erect, their number is beyond recall. The Unitarian Van found in him a true friend in need; and his latest service of the kind was in connection with the new Hostel for the Pioneer Preachers at Highbury. In fact, he had but to be assured that an opening really existed for the further extension of the Unitarian name and influence, and he was prompt to aid it. His private acts of benevolence were equally quick and generous; many a home, many a life, has been lightened by his ever kindly, if discriminating, response to those who pleaded the cause of the stricken and infirm.

And perhaps the happiest hours, certainly the happiest pictures presented in our survey of his long and useful life, were those when in the fulness of the August sunshine, he and his good wife (to whom deepest sympathy now goes from us all) busied themselves as host and hostess to the hundreds of Sunday School teachers whom they invited year by year to spend Bank Holiday in the lovely grounds at King's Ride. Here was no perfunctory hospitality, such as mere money can provide, but the real outpouring of welcome from the heart. True, the same genuine pleasure in giving pleasure showed itself at many another act of hospitality rendered ungrudgingly whenever conferences or special visitors made the occasion desirable. Many a gathering of social distinction, and of political importance, has met under that expansive spirit of welcome. But nothing, evidently, was ever more dear to his heart than those Bank Holiday gatherings. It was a favourite saying with him that if one has been shown a kindness he should "pass it on." The whole spirit and aim of his life was to hand on to others such benefits as inherited wealth can provide, and in this and in all else, to prove his loyalty to the simple religion of "love to God and love to man."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE JOWETT MEMORIAL LECTURE.

PROFESSOR MURRAY ON THE GREEK MYSTERIES.

A LARGE audience gathered at the Passmore Edwards Settlement on Wednesday evening, April 22, to hear Professor Gilbert Murray on "The Conception of Another Life in the Greek Mystery Religions." The chair was taken by Dr. Bosanquet, who said it was hardly necessary to introduce the lecturer, whose scholarly work and literary gifts were known and appreciated wherever the English language was spoken.

Professor Murray dealt first of all with the Homeric conceptions of a future life, which represented it as being a feeble reflection of the present life with no relation to conduct, a phantom-like existence the psychology of which was necessarily obscure, and which was not the kind of thing men were looking for in those periods of home-sickness of the soul when, amidst their ordinary pursuits, they were filled with the idea that there was a life other than the everyday life which was more truly their own. In later Greek literature, however, the idea was considerably developed, and in Pindar's hymns we hear of the consequences of a man's acts following him into the other world. This body, he said, must die, but there is something that comes from God which must live on, a thing infinitely frail, the "reflection of a breath," which shall attain to bliss and joy if a man has endured and kept his hands free from sin. This conception recurs again and again in Plato, and references to it are scattered through the classical literature, and found in a large number of funeral inscriptions. But it is chiefly met with in connection with the Mysteries and Initiations, Eleusinian, Orphic, Pythagorean or Dionysiac, through which the youth had to pass if he wished to achieve the full strength and dignity of manhood. Wherever we meet with the particular conception of an immensely important future life of rewards and punishments, it is always bound up with these Mysteries and Initiations. "He who is initiated," it was said, "shall be saved, but he who is not initiated shall not be saved,"—the note of all exclusive religions. For all practical purposes the uninitiated was unholy. The novice, who had reached the time when it was necessary to put away childish things, had to pass through severe, prolonged, and sometimes horrible ordeals, which often shattered his nerves, and brought him to the verge of insanity, before he emerged into the radiance and joy that awaited him after his torments were over. Afterwards he was given the full status of a citizen, with all the duties and privileges which that involved. There were two sides to these Mysteries—the ugly and grotesque side proper to the low level of culture from which they sprang, and the sublime side proper to the spirit of man struggling upward. The Mysteries were an emphasis of something that in itself was true and fine, and to the boy they meant the dedication of himself to his life's duties, for which no preparations were too hard or too painful.

Professor Murray went on to show in a particularly illuminating and suggestive way that the mental pictures of heaven and hell current in ancient times and among the early Christians were based upon the actual ritual of the Initiations, and were projections of the initiation ceremonies. This he illustrated by quotations from a Christian work of the second century, "The Apocalypse of Peter," in which the influence of the Orphic and Dionysiac mysteries is clearly seen. The shining ones, "whiter than snow and redder than the rose," the region beyond this world full of light and sweet-smelling perfumes to which the purified soul passes after its sojourn in terrifying darkness, and its passage through the pit, or chasm, or lake of mud, the scourging, the death of the lower self, and other strange rites, are all paralleled in the Initiation ceremonies, with which the early Christians were quite familiar, and which, therefore, coloured their conceptions of heaven and hell, and their ideas of the final judgment both of the good and the wicked. Incidentally, it was pointed out that similar ceremonies are practised and similar ideas accepted by many savage tribes, and in every case the over-emphasis of certain truths which were felt to be vital to a man's well-being was the prevailing characteristic.

Passing to another set of men, the Stoics and Epicureans, who did not believe in these fables and initiations, we find that here again the same idea of another life that is infinitely important is prominent in their minds. With them the life that matters is within, it is the life of the soul. Life is like a play, or a game of counters, and the business of the individual is to act well in it, to play the game as it should be played. He has no other responsibility. God, the great dramatist, himself casts us for our part, and whether it be that of a mighty king or an oppressed slave is a matter of no moment. God is not a fool, to judge us by our success or failure; what interests him is the one thing he cannot determine, the action of a man's free will. In this region of the free will lives the life that is really our own, as distinct from the external life which we cannot control; indeed, quite distinct from it, for Epicurus has said that a man can be happy on the rack. This great Stoic gospel seems at first to have rejected all mythologies, yet this conception is almost as much a dream, as much over-emphasised, as that which they had discarded.

Is it a good thing, Professor Murray asked, that we should accustom ourselves to feel, when we are cast down or discouraged by the facts of life, that there is another life which matters infinitely more? A strong case can be made against it, especially in these days, when so much is being made of men's social relations. No one who tries fully to realise the biological fact that man is a gregarious animal, and then tries to sum up the impulses and aims upon which his life rests, must say with the Stoic that here within and not elsewhere does a man's whole soul reside. And yet the voices of nearly all the saints and sages warn us that the judgments of the world are almost always wrong, and that there must be another court of appeal from the delusions of life. Man instinctively feels that he must appeal to some higher authority, and that authority is the projection of his own ideal. All experience helps him to build up in his own soul that inner life, that silent tribunal which is far from infallible, but is the best thing he can turn to if he wishes to discover what is noble and wise. Here is the refuge in which he can find himself, but he cannot share it with another. For in order to give men of your best you must have something within you which you cannot give. You cannot even love another unless you are somehow different from him. We are, indeed, individuals as well as members of a community, and in a sense strangers to one another, alone in our highest thoughts as we are alone when we die. There may seem something hard and bitter in this, but perhaps it is only the necessary condition of social living, and it seems to be this nucleus of fact that lies at the root of the widespread mysteries and dreams they had been considering.

Dr. Bosanquet in a few closing remarks paid a warm tribute to the memory and genius of Professor Jowett, and to Professor Murray, who had done such honour to his name and to learning that night. The proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the lecturer and chairman, proposed by Mrs. Humphry Ward.

DR. HUNTER AT UNIVERSITY HALL.

THE announcement that Dr. John Hunter, late of Trinity Church, Glasgow, would preach every Sunday morning for some weeks at University Hall evidently aroused great interest, for on Sunday morning last many visitors found their way to the beautiful little hall in Gordon-square, and late comers had difficulty in finding seats. One can only describe the service as one of restful simplicity and quiet inspiration. Certainly one never heard Dr. Hunter preach with greater force and intensity. His text was from Isaiah, "There is none that calleth upon thy name, that stirreth up himself to take hold of thee," and the sermon based on this sorrowful confession of bygone days was a stirring call to a fresh realisation of God. "We have heard for many a year," said Dr. Hunter, "about the decay of faith, but what was meant was only the decay of the old formalities, a falling away from ancient standards of belief. But the decay of faith we are now witnessing is a much more serious matter. It is a slackening hold of God, it is a loss of the sense of God. The revival of religion we most need is a recovery of the lost sense of God's presence. This is to be the substance of the message I am to deliver in this place. To those thirsting for novelties I have nothing to say. It will not be to new truths, if there are any such, but to great and everlasting truths I shall ask your attention—truths you know already, but which must never be allowed to become vague or commonplace, truths which it is needful to hear anew and feel afresh." Dr. Hunter quoted the words of Dr. Channing, "I have a growing conviction that the ministry needed in Christian countries is not so much to communicate new truths as to awaken truths that lie dead in the minds of the multitude." "We have heard far too much in recent days," he continued, "about the old and the new in theology and religion. The real things, the great things, are neither old nor new. They may be seen more clearly, realised more vividly, but they remain essentially unchanged from age to age. If I could only send one of you away to-day with a true, living faith in God, enabling you to say from the soul, I believe in God, I should have done for you an eternal life work. Are you taking hold of God? Is He to you merely a sentiment, an idea, a tradition, or is He the one supreme and everlasting reality of life? It is fatally easy to recite the creed, I believe in God the Father Almighty. An unthinking person can do it, a child can do it—even a phonograph can do it, but there is no taking hold of God in that. To take hold of God is not easy; only the prepared and disciplined soul can do it." Dr. Hunter speaking rapidly, and with burning emphasis, went on to indicate the ways in which the realisation of God might be attained. The great pianist exercised his fingers daily that he might keep them supple; the great painter devoted unwearied attention to the study of form and colour, light and shade, yet we—silly souls that we were—expected to have and keep the power that made us sensitive to all that was divine in the universe without great and constant effort. No one ever yet drifted into communion with God. Argument and contention were common enough to-day, but meditation and reflection all too rare. Surely, he said, we should not give less attention to the training of our spiritual faculties than we did to politics, to literature, or to recreation. "Friends, strangers," exclaimed Dr. Hunter in closing, "I plead with you to begin to-day to think of God as you have never thought of Him before." One cannot doubt that those who appreciated this heart-searching and eloquent discourse will look forward eagerly to those which are to follow along the same lines.

The service was rendered the more enjoyable by the singing of the small but efficient choir, who rendered beautifully the unaccompanied anthem, "God is a spirit."

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESSES OF LIBERAL RELIGION IN INDIA.

By the Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND.

VERY satisfactory arrangements have been made in Japan and China for holding International Religious Congresses in those countries. This article is to tell of the equally satisfactory plans formed for a series of congresses in India. Fortunately for our purpose there exists in India a national organisation known as the "All-India Theistic Conference." On my arrival in Calcutta I found a very urgent invitation awaiting me to accept the presidency of that body, which was soon to hold its annual session in Karachi. The excellent opportunity which would be afforded me at such a national gathering to confer with prominent representatives of the Theistic faith from various widely separated sections of the country caused me to accept the invitation. The conference took up the idea of a series of International Congresses in Asia with enthusiasm. Nor did it stop with mere words, but proceeded definitely to invite Dr. Wendte and the other Western brethren to come to India, and appointed a strong committee with full power to make all necessary arrangements. On account of the very large extent of the country and the importance of reaching all sections it was decided to hold, not a single congress in India, but three, and possibly four—one in the East, one in the North, one in the West, and perhaps one in the South. This idea of several congresses had been suggested by Dr. Wendte, but it was also in harmony with the unanimous judgment of the committee with whom the decision of the matter was left.

The "Missionary Pilgrims" from America and Europe will probably enter India at Bombay. This is the largest and most important city in the western part of the country. It is also the headquarters of the progressive and influential Parsee community of India. It would seem fitting, therefore, to hold a brief initial congress of at least two days in Bombay. There is much of interest in the North. Here is the home of the Sikhs, an important theistic people numbering several millions. Here is the main strength of the Arya Somaj, a reform movement that is growing fast, and becoming influential. Here the Mohammedans are particularly strong. Here are located Delhi and Agra, the old Mogul capitals of India, whose wonderful ruins the pilgrims from the West will certainly desire to visit. And here is located Benares, the Hindu "sacred city." It would seem natural, therefore, to plan for a congress in some one of these northern cities. In the East Calcutta is the headquarters of the Brahma Somaj, and more than any other place in India the centre of reform thought and reform activities, religious and of all other kinds. Therefore, as a matter of course, one of the congresses must be held here, and probably the largest and most important of all. If a fourth is held it will be in Madras, the largest city in the South.

Necessarily the initiatory steps in preparing for the congresses in India had to be taken by the Brahmos, for the membership of the All-India Theistic Conference is made up mainly of Brahmos. But representatives of other theistic faiths will be added to the committees of arrangement as well as placed upon the lists of speakers and of honorary presidents and patrons. Thus every pains will be taken to make the congresses inclusive of all believers in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

Many persons of influence are already manifesting their interest in the congress movement, and more still are certain to do so as it becomes more widely known. Rabindra Nath Tagore, the most distinguished poet and literary leader of India, has been chosen president of the congress to be held in Calcutta; and Dr. R. H. Bhandakar, of Poona, one of the foremost Oriental scholars of the world, president of that to be held in Bombay. Sir Narayan Chandravarkar, formerly a judge of the Bombay High Court, and now Premier of the native State of Indore, has been made general chairman of all the committees of arrangement. Other Brahmos of nearly or quite equal distinction are already enlisted in the movement in one way or another. Indeed, we are assured of the strongest possible support of all sections of the Brahma Somaj community. As to the Christian missionaries in India, how much sympathy can be expected from them is yet uncertain.

A considerable number of leading Mohammedans have already expressed to me and to others their interest and their willingness to lend their influence and aid, among them two Justices of the Supreme Court in Calcutta. One of the gratifying surprises that have come to me has been the reception accorded to the congress idea in connection with a visit made to Aligarh College, the chief seat of Mohammedan learning in India. After interviewing the Principal, and explaining to him the purpose of the congresses, I was invited to deliver a public lecture on the subject in the main college auditorium, the Principal himself presiding, in order that the trustees, professors, and students might learn of the movement. I think nowhere in India has the congress conception been received with greater assurance of sympathy than in that large and representative audience of Moslems. A number of prominent leaders of the Arya Somaj, including the Principal of their most important college, have expressed their warm sympathy and desire to co-operate. The same is true of a number of leaders whom I have interviewed among the Sikhs.

Many friends thought it desirable that I should seek an interview with His Highness the Maharajah Gaekwar of Baroda, the most enlightened and influential of the native rulers in India, with a view to securing his co-operation. The interview could not have been more satisfactory. He assured me that the object of the congresses met with his warmest approval, and that we might count upon his aid in any way in his power. At a lecture which I gave by his invitation in the Durbar Hall of the palace, before his Cabinet, his civil and military staff, and others, he showed his interest by personally presiding. He will probably preside at one of the sessions of the Bombay congress. In an interview with the Rajah of Pithipuram, one of the native princes of Southern India, this enlightened popular leader not only assured me of his great interest in the congress movement, but in case of a congress being held in Madras promised himself to bear the entire expense. We have reason to believe that the ruler of the Cutch Behar Native State will give important aid to the congress in Calcutta.

Thus the campaign for the congresses in India seems auspiciously begun. It is in the hands of strong men, who are laying careful and wide-reaching plans; and I do not see any reason to doubt that these plans will be carried to a complete and gratifying success.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE POSITION OF THE FARM LABOURER—THE LABOURERS' UNION—AGRICULTURAL WAGES.

DURING the past week both Houses of Parliament have been discussing the wages of the agricultural labourer, a problem about which there is an astonishing amount of agreement at present among all parties. The change of feeling in this respect is well exemplified in the leading article on the subject in the Times. "The fact that in some districts agricultural wages are too low seems to be universally admitted in all quarters. . . . In insisting on the need for better information, we do not suggest that wages are adequate or throw doubt on the desirability of raising them. . . . We are convinced that wages can and ought to be raised, and the sufficient proof is that they are being raised here and there, either by the voluntary action of employers, as on His Majesty's Norfolk estate, or through the demands of organised labourers under the revived trade union movement, as in Lancashire. The new movement towards agricultural trade unionism," the article continues, "will certainly not be checked by such action as that of Lord Lilford. To turn good men off his land merely because they choose to belong to a union, as we understand that he has done, is to adopt an antiquated attitude wholly out of touch with the current of thought and feeling to-day.

The men have as much right to belong to the union if they choose, as he has to belong to the Carlton Club."

* * *

The trend of the whole article shows that a silent revolution in opinion has been going on. The last sentence in particular touches on a point which is of some importance at the moment. There is at present a preponderance of feeling in favour of raising wages by means of Trade Boards; and there is also a strong feeling among those who have been working in connection with existing Trade Boards that it is better that the workers should be represented on the boards through a trade union. The experience of belonging to a union, of combining with others, of being compelled to think out what they want, and to express their demands clearly to others, is a salutary training in intelligence and independence. It was feared that some classes of sweated workers could not be organised into a union, but if the chainmakers of Cradley Heath could be combined into a union, why not agricultural labourers?

A most lucid, careful, and convincing examination of the whole question of the possibility of raising agricultural wages has recently been made by Mr. Reginald Lennard (London: Macmillan & Co., 5s. net). He is of opinion that a rise is possible, although safeguards would have to be provided against unemployment. Nevertheless, he thinks that a tendency to reduce the volume of agricultural employment is probably but the dark side of an advance towards improvement in the efficiency of farm labourers, and an increase in the national dividend. Unemployment also might be reduced by the development of agricultural science and enterprise, and the encouragement of small holdings. His general conclusion is as follows:—"As to the extent to which agricultural wages might be raised, either generally or in different districts, nothing has been said. That can best be discovered, not by the reasoning of the economist, but by daring and yet careful and sympathetic experiment, carried out either through the agency of Wages Boards established for each county, or by the determination of some central authority after careful inquiry into local conditions." The whole of Mr. Lennard's investigation is most illuminating and impartial, and can hardly leave any doubt on the mind of any fair-minded person as to the direction in which progress must be made.

PROFESSOR EUGÈNE FAY, Directeur de l'École des Hautes Études, is announced to give three public lectures at Manchester College, Oxford, on Saturday, May 30, Tuesday, June 2, and Thursday, June 4. His subject will be "Gnosticism, its Evolution and Historical Importance."

A CORRESPONDENT informs us that the National Lending Library for the Blind, 125, Queen's-road, Bayswater, London, W. (E. W. Austin, Esq., Secretary), contains a selection of 18,000 volumes in Braille and Moon type, and 3,000 pieces of music, and these works are being added to annually by about 1,500 volumes. Subjects:—Travel, biography, science, history, essays, and many novels.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Belper.—A special meeting of the Field-row congregation was recently held to celebrate the conclusion of the first five years of the ministry of the Rev. A. Leslie Smith, B.A., and his acceptance of the appointment from the trustees for a further period. It was a social reunion of those who attend the chapel, and showed an increase in the spirit of unity and devotion. During the evening speeches were made by Mr. T. Allwood (in the chair), Mr. W. Jones, the secretary, and the Rev. A. Leslie Smith.

British Women's League.—A contributor to the Westminster Gazette, writing upon the subject of churches and emigrants, points out that "there is a great slackness on the part of clergy and ministers in not making adequate attempts to provide for members who leave these shores." He goes on to say: "Neither clergy nor ministers take steps to ensure that those who go to Canada to live receive letters of introduction to Canadian communions." The Women's League, by its Fellowship Section, is doing just the work in the Liberal Church communities which is indicated by this writer as being so necessary; and with the co-operation of all the League branches it is hoping to extend its activities still further. Miss Grace Mitchell, the Fellowship secretary, will speak upon the subject at Leeds and Liverpool in June. At the last meeting of the committee the Rev. W. E. Williams, late of Evesham, who is going to take charge of the Auckland Church, was present by invitation for a short time, and Mrs. W. Blake Odgers (president, W.L.), conveyed the good wishes of the committee to Mr. Williams for a successful ministry, and sent greetings from the British League to the women of Auckland.

Dunmurry.—On the occasion of his return home after his recent marriage the Rev. J. A. Kelly and Mrs. Kelly were cordially welcomed at a meeting in the Courthouse, Dunmurry, when a presentation was made on behalf of the congregation of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, who conveyed to Mr and Mrs. Kelly the kind wishes of their friends. Speeches were made by the Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, the Rev. Benjamin Banks (rector of Dunmurry), the Rev. Robert Davey, and several others. The Rev. J. A. Kelly suitably replied on behalf of himself and Mrs. Kelly.

Horsham.—The usual course of winter evening lectures at the Free Christian Church was concluded by one from the Rev. H. Livens on "Piers Ploughman." Previously Mrs. Bridges Adams had spoken on "Working Class Education," the Rev. H. Gow on "The Meaning of Tragedy," and Dr. Evans Darby on his Canadian peace campaign. During last week two weddings took place, both of which were conducted by the Rev. J. J. Marten. The Rev. Victor Moody was married on the 16th to Miss Taylor; and on the 18th Miss Jupp, who has long been connected with the choir and the Sunday school, was married to Mr. Frank Marwell. Many friends were present to offer their good wishes which were also expressed in a more tangible form.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The Sunday-school anniversary in connection with the Unitarian Church was held on Sunday evening, April 19, when the service was conducted and an address given by the Rev. Arthur Scruton. Mr. Ion Pritchard, president of the Sunday School Association, who was visiting Stockton on behalf of the Forward Movement, spoke to the children both at the evening service and in the afternoon, and also met the teachers in an open conference.

Walsley Chapel (Bolton).—On Easter Saturday and Monday a sale of work took place with the object of raising a sum of £150 for wiping out a debt caused by repairs to the school and chapel, the installation of a new organ, and for the formation of a reserve fund for future emergencies. Mr. J. Percy Taylor, J.P., of Bolton, performed the opening ceremony on Saturday, and Dr. Robinson presided. On Monday the opening ceremony at 2.30 p.m. was performed by the children of the Sunday school. The receipts were a little over £200.

Whitby.—On Sunday evening last a memorial sermon for the late minister, the Rev. Geo. Knight, was preached by the Rev. J. Wain, of Scarborough, in the old Flowergate Chapel. There was a numerous congregation and the discourse is well reported in the Whitby Gazette. Arrangements are being made for the supply of the pulpit until a successor is appointed.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE SCHOOL OF THE ARYA SAMAJ.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has recently described in the Daily Chronicle a visit which he paid while in India to the Gurukula, where the children of members of the Arya-Samaj are educated. This school is frowned upon by the powers that be, for it follows an independent course of its own, there are no Englishmen on its staff, the text books on English literature prescribed by the Punjab University as the basis of Indian higher education are not in use, no students are sent up for University examinations, and the college confers its own degrees. Nevertheless, the Gurukula, amidst its flower-gardens fragrant with rose and jessamine, "is the most momentous thing in Indian education that has been done since Macaulay sat down to put his opinions into a minute in 1835." There are three hundred boys now being trained there. They must be between six and ten years of age when they enter, and they stay till they are twenty-five. They rise at four o'clock from their hard deal beds, do physical exercises and bathe in cold water, after which they offer worship to God. In the hottest weather they go barefooted and bareheaded, for it is needful that they should be prepared for a hard life if such should be their lot.

ALL the boys are under the legal guardianship of one known by the title of Mahatma-ji, their "father," who is thus described by Mr. MacDonald:—"A tall, magnificent figure bearing itself with commanding grace comes to meet us. A painter of the modern school would welcome it as a model for the Christ, one of medieval tastes would see in it a form of the Apostle Peter—though a trifle tall and commanding for the fisherman. Mahatma-ji bids us welcome and we pass into his simply furnished room dominated by the tinsel symbol OM. We bow our heads whilst Mahatma-ji says grace. I have heard many graces, but none like this. Our host's rich, sonorous voice, lingering long over the Sanskrit vowels, makes the perfect music of penitential thanksgiving. When the meal is over," continues Mr. MacDonald, "we go round the school. All is order and happiness. Little things with bright, sparkling eyes, older ones with sedate faces, fill the class rooms, making their models of clay, repeating their lessons together, chanting their verses, listening to their teachers—for the lecture is largely employed at the Gurukula. Classes ended, there is a hearty rush to the playing grounds, each pupil as he passes the Master bowing at his feet, and with an upward sweep of his joined hands doing him reverence. . . . The little voices chant in unison: 'We offer to God, omniscient, the giver of knowledge, the light of lights.' Again the little voices chant: 'Oh God, we offer to Thee, Who art all in all.'"

A SOCIALIST WITH A CONSERVATIVE MIND

Mr. Bernard Shaw, a very old colleague and friend of Hubert Bland, whose death occurred last week, describes him as a man of "anti-erratic" temperament, who, if he had not been a Socialist, "would have been an extreme Tory." Mr. Bland helped to found the Fabian Society, was the writer of one of the famous "Fabian Essays," and originally a member of the Social Democratic Federation, taking part with William Morris in the secession which formed the Socialist League. Unlike many of his fellow-workers in the cause, however, he sprang from the landowning classes, was a Roman Catholic, had a contempt for "fads," paid considerable attention to his clothes, and never was compelled to struggle with poverty. At one time he edited To-Day, a journal now long extinct. His contributions to the Sunday Chronicle and his volumes of essays on a wide variety of subjects, both light and serious, were read by a large circle of readers. Mr. Shaw always regretted that his output was not larger, and often declared that "his giant shoulders sapped more energy than they were worth." "He had very strong common sense," to quote again from Mr. Shaw, "and a good deal of knowledge—I will not say a thorough knowledge of the world (for that is too much to say of any man), but he knew what the middle class, the suburban middle class, man was thinking about. Though an educationist, he had great military enthusiasm, and in that way he had in his nature a compound—not uncommon—of ferocity and humanitarianism." Mrs. Bland, with whom he sometimes collaborated, is the well-known writer, "E. Nesbit."

DR. ELIOT'S PHILOSOPHY OF HEALTH.

The enterprising editor of the Ladies' Home Journal, one of the most popular magazines in America, has induced Dr. Eliot to write three columns of personal reminiscence explaining how he has kept his health and working power till his eightieth year. In the course of this article he gives some useful hints which, if we could only follow them, would considerably lessen the strain on our nerves which we all experience more or less. "I am aware of two mental or moral conditions," he says, "which have contributed to my safe endurance of physical and mental strains. The first is a natural gift, namely, a calm temperament; the second is the result of a combination of this temperament with a deliberate practice of avoiding alike anticipations of disappointment and vain regrets. When necessarily involved in contests or critical undertakings I tried first to do my best in the actual struggle, and then not to concern myself too much about the issue. That was not my responsibility. When blocked or defeated in an enterprise I had much at heart I always turned immediately to another field of work where progress looked possible, hiding my time for a chance to resume the obstructed road. An administrator can thus avoid waste of energy and a chronic state of disappointment and worry. If anyone says that these methods require a serene mind or disposition I can only say that it is hard to tell whether the sound nervous system produces, or results from, the serenity. Certainly anyone who ardently desires to cultivate a calm temperament and serenity of spirit would do well to provide himself, if possible, with strong muscles and obedient nerves."

THE "AGAMEMNON" AT SYRACUSE.

The recent performance of the "Agamemnon" of Æschylus which took place in the ancient theatre of Syracuse on April 16 was a very great success, and, judging by all accounts, made a deep impression on the thousands of spectators who filled the worn grey tiers of seats. "To the right," says a correspondent in the Times, "had been built Agamemnon's palace, a large dignified structure of wood with massive columns. On one side rose the watchman's tower a hundred feet high. The left was enclosed by a wall of Cyclopean masonry pierced by a square entrance, over which were carved in marble the lions of Mycenæ. Altars to Dionysus, Zeus, and other gods, and memorial stones stood in the precincts of the palace." The scene when the body of Agamemnon was borne out, the writer continues, was very impressive and beautiful. "The solemn music, the rich-coloured groups of figures in the foreground, the funeral procession making its way slowly through the crowd prostrate before the body of its murdered King, the dove-grey wall with its ancient gateway, and beyond the blue sea and rose-tinted city now fading in the failing light and soft in the evening haze—all this, with the consciousness of the 7,000 hushed spectators around one, makes a noble ending to a very beautiful resurrection of the Greek tragedy."

PROBLEM No. 54.

By PHILIP H. WILLIAMS.

BLACK. (7 men.)

WHITE. (5 men.)

White to play and mate in two moves.

SOLUTION OF No. 52.

1. Kt. R6 (key-move).

Correct solutions from Dr. C. G. Higginson, W. E. Arkell, R. B. D. (Edinburgh), E. C. (Highbury), W. T. M. (Sunderland), Rev. I. Wrigley, Rev. B. C. Constable, D. Amos, E. Wright, F. S. M. (Mayfield), Walter Coventry, A. Mielziner, A. S. Rodgers, J. W. (Belfast), Geo. Ingledew (and 51A).

NOTE.—Owing to the Chess Editor's change of address for the summer months there may be other communications which have not yet reached him.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. S. M. (Mayfield).—Sorry, but we went mostly to the sea from Heathfield.

E. WRIGHT.—The use of the White Q in No 52 is essential, though it is uneconomical. If 1... K. Q2, dis. ch. 2. B x R is mate, and the Q defends an escape square.

E. C. (Highbury).—Thanks for your complimentary remarks on my first anniversary.

R. B. D. (Edinburgh).—I appreciate your card. We composers are very jealous of reputation, and look upon solvers as our "friend—the enemy." Perhaps, therefore, a mild protest is excusable!

CHAS. WILLING (U.S.A.).—Solutions Nos. 49 and 50 to hand, and correct, as usual.

GEO. INGLEDREW.—Nothing has been decided yet.

No. 54 is a version of one of those ideas essentially peculiar to problems—a Black force radiating defence upon two points. This is most frequently secured by the use of the Black Q, and, owing to initial position, there are possibilities in connection with this Black force, which may (a) either move to a certain square and still command the two points—in so doing allowing a different mate—or (b) be prevented from reaching this other focal point. The theme is capable of much extension. The example quoted is fairly simple, since the number of men employed is not great. Problem No. 11 (June 21 last) is another, and far better, example of the device. It is also possible to render the idea in three-move form. To the typical game-player this theme conveys but little, since such defences so rarely occur in an ordinary game.

Board and Residence, &c.

GRANGE-OVER-SANDS, LANCs.—Miss ALICE E. PASSAVANT receives Paying Guests at 2, Newlands. Terms on application.

LONDON.—Board-Residence, Miss E. KINGSTON, "Brantwood," 15, Endsleigh-street, Tavistock-square, W.C. (near University Hall). Terms moderate.

BRIGHTON AND HOVE.—Summer School and Holiday Recreative Party (3rd year) will be held in a mansion standing in beautifully wooded grounds, approached by Lodge entrance and carriage drive, through an avenue of trees. Centrally and charmingly situated near sea.—Prospectus from Mr. and Mrs. MASSINGHAM, Food Reform Guest House, 17, Norfolk-terrace, Brighton.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S IMPORTANT PUBLICATIONS.

The Working Faith of a Liberal Theologian. By the Rev. T. RHONDDA WILLIAMS. In One Vol. 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

The way in which the subjects are dealt with shows that the author is not theorising, but speaking out of practical certainties in his own life and experience. He has found that this faith works in the Church and out of it, in joy and in sorrow, and he is prepared to say of it that it is adequate to the demands of Life here, and full of promise for the hereafter.

Ritual and Belief. Studies in the History of Religion. By EDWIN SYDNEY HARTLAND, F.S.A., Author of "Primitive Paternity," "The Legend of Perseus," &c. In One Vol. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

This work is designed as a contribution to the study of the evolution of religion. It discusses recent speculations on the subject, insisting on the share of human emotion and imagination as at least equally important with that of reason, in generating and developing the beliefs and practices which we class together under the name of religion.

The Spiritual Message of Dante. By the Rt. Rev. W. BOYD CARPENTER, K.C.V.O., D.D., LL.D. (late Bishop of Ripon). Crown 8vo, cloth. With Illustrations. 5s. net.

"Reveals knowledge of the poems both wide and deep, and a spiritual amity of temperament to the poet that makes him an admirable interpreter of his ideas, especially in their element of permanent and abiding worth."—Birmingham Post.

The Foundations of Duty; or, Man's Duty to God, his Fellow-Men, and Himself. By the Rt. Rev. J. W. DIGGLE, D.D., Bishop of Carlisle. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"Marked by deep thinking, lucidity, and spiritual emphasis. To the reader with an eye for spiritual things it will be pure gold."—Church Family Newspaper.

The Philosophy of Prof. RUDOLF EUCKEN.

Knowledge and Life. Translated by the Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D. (Jena).

"Dr. Tudor Jones has enriched the Crown Theological Library by translating this volume, that will be of great interest, not only to students of philosophy and religion, but also to all thoughtful persons."—Christian Commonwealth.

Present-Day Ethics. In their relation to the Spiritual Life. Translated by MARGARET VON SEYDEWITZ. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. net; postage inland, 3d. extra.

The Truth of Religion. Translated by W. TUDOR JONES, D.Phil. (Jena).

(Second and Revised Edition based on the latest German edition.)

"The book holds the reader's attention by the energy that surges through the whole, while he is charmed with the eloquence and wealth of language preserved in Dr. Jones' excellent translation. . . . There can be little doubt that this is one of the greatest apologies for religion ever written."—Christian Commonwealth.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net; postage inland, 6d. extra.

The Life of the Spirit. An Introduction to Philosophy. Translated by F. L. POGSON, M.A. [4th Impression.]

"For the instructed reader it is full of helpful suggestions. It offers us no conclusions, but it sets us on the road towards them, and fills us with hopeful stimulus for the march."—Christian World.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE are few agencies which are doing more to maintain a high standard of justice and rectitude at the heart of our political life than the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society. It inherits the noble traditions of the anti-slavery days, and speaks with force and directness to instincts of freedom and respect for human life, which are among the moving forces of English character at its best. At the annual meeting held last week a letter was read from Sir Harry Johnston in which he pointed out that there are 830 millions of the Non-Caucasian race in the world, and of these nearly one-half were within the limits of the British Empire or its sphere of political influence. We could destroy them with modern weapons, disease, alcohol, deprivation of freedom; but could we replace them by a population which would prove as suitable to climate and surroundings? If we were not going to exterminate them we must protect. Subsequently Mr. W. H. Dickinson spoke in very plain terms of the greed for wealth as the chief cause of cruelty. They must see to it, he said, that wealth was procured for a civilised country according to civilised and humane methods.

ALL friends of the Anti-Slavery Society, and especially its able secretaries, have reason to congratulate themselves on the publication last week of the White Book dealing with Contract Labour in Portuguese West Africa. It should do much to increase the prestige of the Society in public opinion. The White Book is very painful reading, but it confirms in every particular the case which the Anti-Slavery Society has presented with unwearied patience and insistence to the Foreign Office, at first it must be confessed with small encouragement and scant chance of success. Now the whole case is clear. It is proved beyond the possibility of dispute that a system of slavery on an extensive scale has existed on the cocoa plantations. The Portuguese Government has given its consent to important reforms in administration, and promised that the "serviçaes" engaged for San Thomé and Príncipe shall be repatriated at the expiration of their contracts. On our side there will have to be ceaseless vigilance to see that these conditions are carried out in accordance with our treaty rights. Fortunately we have an able and energetic official on the spot, in the person of Vice-Consul Smallbones, who is quite alive to the extent of the evil and the need of energetic action.

It is good news that a new Church paper, to be called The Challenge, which will be free from the strong bias of party politics, will start publication this week. "Artifex" of the Manchester Guardian, who we believe is not unconnected with the new venture, writes of it as follows:—"Although I have no reason to suppose for a moment that The Challenge will be a definitely Liberal paper in the party acceptance of the term, but rather have many reasons for hoping that it will not be; yet it must be admitted that many Liberals wish for some religious paper which they can read without finding a strong Conservative bias in every sentence. Some couple of years ago or more the editor of the Church Guardian wrote to this paper to explain that his paper had been originally published as a distinctly Conservative organ, and that it had never from the first pretended to be anything else. And though we have not the same explicit admission in the case of most of the other Church newspapers it would be difficult to name one which anyone could mistake for anything but a strongly Conservative print. And so the wants of Liberal Churchmen are not very satisfactorily supplied."

* * *

In adopting this attitude of detachment, while reserving its right to speak with clearness and vigour upon all the great topics of contemporary life from the point of view of moral and spiritual ideals, The Challenge falls into line with a policy which we have long tried to support. If its atmosphere is strong and kindling it will be able to lift matters of controversy onto a higher plane of thought and feeling, and its own emphatic judgments will meet with the respect due to the trained intelligence and the moral and religious sincerity which it brings to bear upon the critical problems of life. Not that it will escape the good discipline of opposition and dissent, and it may be the occasional resentment of the partisan who cannot imagine that anyone can possibly disagree with him except from motives of passion and prejudice. But these are the joys of a difficult game, and we have little doubt that The Challenge will play the game fairly and nobly in the interest of religion and whatsoever things are just and of good report.

THE Council of the Churchmen's Union has forwarded to the Upper House of the Canterbury Convocation a petition in favour of the intellectual freedom of the clergy and cordial relations between the Episcopal and non-Episcopal Churches.

"We regard it as a matter of grave importance," the memorialists affirm, "that the clergy should be encouraged to study and discuss reverently and freely the critical and historical problems which are forced upon the modern student of the Old and New Testaments, to publish the result of their studies, and to face the task of interpreting and restating the traditional doctrines of Christianity in such ways as may be demanded by newly-discovered truth.

"While asserting without reserve our belief in the Incarnation and Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ we submit that a wide liberty of belief should be allowed with regard to the mode and attendant circumstances of both.

"We believe that real study, thought, and discussion will be discouraged if clergymen, who, in matters not affecting the essential truth of Christianity, arrive at conclusions which are opposed to traditional or momentarily dominant opinions, are to be removed from their offices or denounced as dishonest for retaining them. We venture to recall to your Lordships the dictum of Archbishop Temple, 'If the conclusions are prescribed, the study is precluded.'"

THE petition concludes with a pertinent reminder of the fallibility of formal declarations.

"We dutifully and respectfully pray your Lordships to remember how often in the past, when the Episcopate or the Convocations have attempted to pronounce authoritatively upon scientific, critical, or historical questions, they have committed themselves to positions which are now by practically universal consent admitted to be untenable."

The clauses in the petition which deal with the claims of intellectual freedom have been signed by a numerous body of eminent men, in addition to the members of the Council of the Churchmen's Union, including the Dean of St. Paul's, Bishop Boyd Carpenter, Canon Sanday, the Master of the Temple, Dr. Llewelyn Davies, Professor Burkitt, the Headmasters of Westminster and Rugby, Professor Caldecott, Professor Bethune Baker, and Professor Emery Barnes.

No reason is given for the implied dissent on the part of a large number of the signatories from the first two clauses of the petition, which are as follows:—

"The Church of England has at all periods since the Reformation included both those who do not and those who do accept the doctrine of the 'Apostolical succession' and the necessity of Episcopacy as a matter of jus divinum. We earnestly trust that your lordships will do nothing to curtail the liberty in this respect which the formularies of our Church allow, and which its clergy and laity have hitherto in practice enjoyed.

"We trust that nothing will be done to make it more difficult for individual Bishops, other clergy, and laymen, to act as their own conscience and judgment direct in the matter of co-operation and religious fellowship with the members of non-Episcopal Churches."

* * *

POSSIBLY it was thought wiser to confine the issue to a narrower field, but we fear that it must be confessed that many of the liberal clergy are still quite conservative in their attitude to Nonconformists. It is contrary to a deeply ingrained tradition to treat the Nonconformist as a spiritual equal. They would be uncomfortable if they took any part in Nonconformist worship and would on the whole prefer that it should not exist. Many things, however, are helping to break down this alienation on both sides. There has been a great improvement in relations in the last twenty years, and cordial and helpful friendship is taking the place of distant respect. Moreover, the whole question of the place and authority of the Episcopate in the Church is largely a problem of history, and it must be studied under precisely the same conditions of intellectual freedom, with a reserve of liberty to come to different conclusions in face of the evidence, which is always difficult and often very obscure, and to act accordingly.

FATHER VAUGHAN has been telling a meeting of advertising specialists that religion is the only thing worth advertising, and he went on to maintain that he himself belonged to the oldest and biggest advertising firm on their planet—the Catholic Church. If this is only a rather loud and bouncing way of saying: "Let your light shine before men," we agree. Religious people must not allow their claim to be heard to be elbowed aside in a crowded and pushing world. There is no excuse for the neglect of proper business methods and orderly and attractive arrangements, because our appeal is not to men's pockets but to their souls. But it does not follow that it is possible to use ordinary methods of advertisement, which tend to neglect strict standards of truthfulness, without destroying the very thing we have to offer. Sensationalism may pique curiosity, but we never heard that it could 'produce the humble and the contrite heart. The much advertised preacher may draw the crowd and fill the church with an audience who come to listen to him and not to worship God, but unless he has the graces of all the saints he is likely to become self-conscious and self-opiniated and to lose his own soul.

* * *

THE familiar subject of Nonconformity and the theatre has recently renewed its youth in the columns of the Westminster Gazette. There is still a large number of earnest people who believe that the only way to purify the theatre is to abolish it altogether. This is the position of Mr. William Goudie. He makes an important contribution to the discussion of the problem, which ought to be considered very carefully by those who are least inclined to accept his extreme position, when he argues that a play which is demoralising to witness must be bad for the actors. There must, he thinks, be some moral loss or injury to the soul, if it does not lead to actual wrong-doing. The Rev. J. W. Horsley recommends a concerted movement to boycott certain theatres. What we want, he says, is expert advice, a responsible committee of a League, similar to the American League for the purification of the drama and for the guidance of inexperienced play-goers, which should prepare a white list of current plays, and decide after the first night whether a new play should go on the list or not.

* * *

THERE are some obvious objections to Mr. Horsley's plan, chiefly concerned with the composition of the proposed committee. If its members were for the most part conventional moralists, without any freshness of insight, we might simply get a repetition of the farce of the censorship, and find that scathing moral satire was condemned while plays full of subtle innuendo managed to escape detection. But nothing could well be worse than the present situation, which is exposed in scathing terms by E. F. S., the able dramatic critic of the Westminster Gazette. Referring to the refusal to license Brieux's "Damaged Goods" for the stage, he writes:—"You may present with the blessing of the Lord Chamberlain plays of an obviously immoral or erotic character, dramas which glorify vice and make fun of virtue, which treat conjugal fidelity as comic and offer for admiration the loosest of libertines. . . It is permissible to play upon the passions of young people with song and dance, and players wearing provocative costumes, and thereby do your best to drive them into sin. And all this with the full approval of the King's officials. . . At a time when in this country luxury has reached a pitch unparalleled, and when sexual excitements seem almost every day to increase in number and force, the sober people ought to be allowed to do something by way of antidote."

SYMBOLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.

ALL religious language, which has in it any depth of meaning, is necessarily inadequate. It is in the world of sense that there is the closest agreement about the meaning of words. A table, a chair, a horse, a cart have a fairly uniform meaning, and they can be used with confidence without fear of misunderstanding. But as soon as we enter the world of faith and affection this is not so. "Faith" to one man means accepting certain bald statements about religion as true. To another it suggests the highest act of personal trust of which the soul is capable. "Love" to the selfish or the sensual is still closely intertwined with bodily desires; but to the disciple of CHRIST it is the word which best describes the nature of God. Even "God," as the word dwells upon human lips, has no steady and persistent meaning. It varies with our experience. To one man it is arbitrary Will; to another abstract Reason; to another the Father of our spirits. It is, we suppose, the object of religious training to secure a uniform depth and richness of content in the use of these words, not by the path of definition, but by the creation of a common experience and a common atmosphere.

All this would probably be granted by most thoughtful people. The real difficulty arises when we come to deal with historical events which have entered into close alliance with religious faith. The mere statement that JESUS CHRIST lived and died, apart from the judgment of value which we pass upon it, is like any other recorded fact in ancient history. We accept it as true, and multitudes of other people do the same, in the sense that they could have seen with their own eyes and heard with their own ears if they had been there. But to the Christian this bald statement is a symbol of things which eye hath not seen nor ear heard, of spiritual forces and possibilities, of purposes of love and an ideal of character, which are recalled to his mind, now dimly, now with poignant clearness, according to his mood or the stage he has reached in spiritual development, every time the name of JESUS CHRIST is mentioned. He knows that he can never look at that figure coldly, in critical detachment from his significance for the world's life. What he said, what he did, these were events in time, but they are also the accepted symbols of something beyond time. It is a region in which we use words not as instruments of scientific precision, but for their power of suggestion, and because they conserve for us the secret of life which is liberated for some new purpose of good whenever the word passes from the lips into the heart.

From this point of view we are prepared to apply the principle of symbolical interpretation to all the Christian facts, and it is only in so far as we are able to do this that they can retain their significance for our own religious experience. But this does not mean that we are to withdraw them from the close scrutiny of critical inquiry or to refuse to revise the traditional judgments of the Christian Church upon their value. If we take the Gospel story as a whole, it is clear that it appeals to men of the modern world in a new way. Their selection of the things which strike them as of chief importance is different from what it used to be. We are not referring to the total impression of love and goodness and conquering spiritual power, but to the happenings which are richest in spiritual suggestion to their own minds. It is not the confession of scepticism but the verdict of a deeply illuminating experience when they turn from the story of a miraculous birth to the life spent in doing good, or are more deeply impressed by the manifest victory of love upon the cross than by the empty tomb and a physical ascension into heaven. This principle of selectiveness, based upon a living sense of religious values, was indeed operative from the earliest time. ST. PAUL finds in the resurrection of CHRIST a fit symbol of the risen life, which all men are to live in intimate fellowship with the things which are above. But nowhere in the New Testament writings is the strange narrative of a miraculous birth used in a similar way. It made no appeal to spiritual experience. There is not even a hint that it can be used as a symbol of something of abiding worth for the souls of men.

In his Open Letter, to which we referred last week, the Bishop of OXFORD allows himself to use this principle in a modest and limited way in assigning relative values to the various clauses of the Apostles' Creed. He sees that the belief in a literal "descent into hell" and a literal ascension into heaven have disappeared with the mediæval conception of the world. "When I say 'He descended into hell,'" he writes, "and also when in a more general sense I say 'He ascended into heaven, and sitteth &c.,' I confess to the use of metaphor in a historical statement, because the historical statement carries me outside the world of present possible experience, and symbolical language is the only language that I can use." This is an interesting point of view, though we do not think that it is compatible with a use of the Creed in its plain historical meaning, or that the reason alleged is one that will bear close examination. Formerly men had no difficulty in accepting these words as literally true. Now they are so obviously in conflict with modern knowledge that they can only be retained as figurative language. But what DR. GORE entirely fails to perceive is this, that precisely the same difficulty is felt by a growing number of men about the miraculous birth. Apart from the documentary evidence which no historical student could possibly call conclusive, it is just as repugnant as the "descent into hell" to our customary modes of thinking, and finds no place in the universe of divine activity as it has been revealed to us. Nor can it be saved for religious use on the ground that it satisfies our religious needs. It is just because it stands entirely out of relation to these needs that it is dropping away so completely without any sense of struggle or loss. If we believed that ordinary human birth involves defilement or that we ourselves would be in a stricter sense partakers of the divine nature if we had come into the world without an earthly father, then it might still find some place as a symbol of heavenly birth. But we do not believe anything of the kind. Even the people who are most insistent that it must be retained seem quite unable to attach any spiritual value to it. It is one of the cases where symbolical interpretations do not apply.

We venture accordingly to plead that symbolical interpretation is not a method of escaping from the difficulties which are created for the modern mind by historical criticism or changing views of the world. It has a higher and a much nobler use. In the first place, it deals with the concrete, the real, the historically true, and reveals height above height, depth below depth of love and power, where the unspiritual man sees nothing but the ordinary happenings of life and death. In this sense JESUS CHRIST is for us the supreme religious symbol, not because we can dissolve him into a myth and retain him as an idea, but just because we can do nothing of the kind. There are no unsearchable riches of love, no deep mysteries of the soul inviting us to read their secret, in persons who never lived or events that never happened. In the second place, symbolical interpretation helps us to grasp the relative importance of events which are presented to us in an historical series like the Gospel narrative. It is those which embody for us some deep truth of life, and relate themselves intimately to the possibilities of our own experience, and are thus really symbolical, which we rightly regard as primary and essential. As for the rest, except in so far as they help to build up the complete picture or win some value through association with sublime surroundings, they remain events, separated from us by the lapse of years, with little significance for religion. It is not everything of traditional importance which will survive this searching test; but we must have the courage to apply it with complete candour, searching out carefully where the deeper meanings and the unexplored secrets really lie, if we would make an end of false emphasis and barren apologetic and recover a personal sense of Christianity as creative power in the world, as something that is alive with the possibilities of infinite growth in our own souls.

HARD SAYINGS OF JESUS.

"It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of God."—MARK X. 25.

THIS statement, which presented scarcely less difficulty in the first century than it does in the twentieth, circulated in the earliest Christian community as a saying of our Lord. It is found not only in all three synoptic gospels but also occurred in the gospel according to the Hebrews. This gospel, of which all but a few fragments have perished, belongs, in the judgment of many scholars, to a period even earlier than our first three gospels. Some of its remains are obviously late and legendary in character. But a gospel which gives as words of Jesus, "Never be glad, except when you look on your brother in love" and puts amongst the greatest offenders "the man who saddened his brother's spirit" has certainly preserved some precious treasures of our Master's mind. Amongst these is the report of an interview between Jesus and a rich young man, and the hard saying that immediately follows as in the canonical gospels. Again, the surprise which Christ's words about wealth evoked on the part of the disciples proves that they were not in harmony with their thoughts, and do not, therefore, owe their existence to an evangelist or hearer of our Lord. The motive and capacity for invention are both wanting. The saying is hyperbolic and characteristic of Christ.

The prosaic explanation of "the needle's eye" is that it is the name of a low arched way used by foot-passengers, through which a camel could pass only with difficulty, when stripped of trappings and merchandise. Such exegesis may lie behind the saying of Shakespeare (Richard II., Act 5, Scene 5):—

It is as hard to come as for a camel

To thread the postern of a small needle's eye, for a "postern" is a back door or gate. But this represents merely Western shrinking from a bold Eastern hyperbole. Jesus, as we cannot too frequently remind ourselves, was an Oriental—a man who could speak of Pharisees devouring widows' houses, of a beam in the eye, and of those who strained at the gnat and swallowed the camel. By means of these rhetorical figures he compelled attention to his teaching.

Incidentally, the amazement of the disciples throws light upon their position and prospects. That the gospel was preached to the poor is a historical fact of abiding significance. That the preachers were poor men is more questionable. Jesus himself was a carpenter; an early tradition adds, a maker of ploughs and yokes. The sons of Zebedee had hired servants in their boats; Peter was a householder; Matthew a customs officer, able to make a great feast for his friends when he accepted the call of Christ. Our Lord's injunction to his disciples to take with them no gold or silver or change of raiment presumes the possibility of such a proceeding. Parables which refer to money, stewardship, suppers and the like were never addressed to men who knew not what such things were. A missionary in darkest Africa does not harangue the natives upon the perils of metaphysics and the folly of bimetallism. The disciples were amazed at Christ's teaching because they knew what their own condition was, and had been. Hence Peter ventured to remind his Master of the sacrifices they had made—"We have left all"—implying that they had something to leave. Glorification of poverty for its own sake there is none in the gospel narrative, for the word "poor" to the Hebrew mind means more than destitute. Even in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, it should be observed that the rich Abraham is in bliss with the beggar, and Lazarus neither denounces on earth the superfluity of Dives nor triumphs in the reversal of their fortunes.

It was the worldliness which wealth produced, and the prepossession in favour of riches as a means of salvation, against which Jesus constantly protested. In the opinion of his own disciples, it was easier for a rich man than for a poor man to be saved. If men with leisure for prayer and ample means for almsgiving and sacrifice cannot enter the kingdom, how shall the toiling multitude engaged in the struggle for existence? Nay, they could scarcely conceive a kingdom in which there were no notables or wealthy folk. Only by a slow process of education did they at length perceive the nature of the kingdom proclaimed by Christ wherein he is Master who is servant of all.

We suffer from the same blindness of vision. We too eagerly assume that riches confer pre-eminence. Howbeit, signs of change are not wanting. The mere plutocrat has little power in the intellectual world, and in the sphere of politics his privileges are at least challenged. Alas! that in the Church the patronage of the purse still prevails.

But Jesus did not speak in vain. In Jewish thought, prosperity and poverty had been regarded as marks of God's approval or disapproval. This doctrine lies at the heart of the problem of the great drama of Job. Satan is testing the patriarch to ascertain if his piety will survive the loss of his property. At the close, though Job is reconciled to God without the restoration of his wealth, a later editor has added, for the edification of his readers, that "The Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before." From this dark teaching Jesus rescued the Church. A man is not saved by gold or silver, but rather in their despite. Idleness is the handmaid of selfishness and vice. Unless a wealthy man realises the beauty of holiness, and responds to Christ's call for service, he is a lost soul. "The cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in choke the Word." A settled indifference to sorrow and suffering is not infrequently found in men who might be saviours. "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God."

OUR VILLAGE.

III.

WHEN I tell my city friends that we have no reading room nor library, no museum nor art gallery, no cinema house nor music hall, no casino nor club in our village, they, with difficulty, suppress surprise how, in so enlightened an age as ours, ignorance so palpable can persist. They do not understand. Perhaps we have that which makes the need of these adjuncts unfelt. We have mossy hedges and fern-fringed lanes, the like of which were never seen outside Paradise. Nowhere blooms the thorn so milk-white as on our bushes; nowhere murmurs the wind tales so fraught with feeling as in the tree-tops of our woods; nowhere so plaintive the cooing of the cushat as in our groves; nowhere the carols of the lark rain with such delirious delight as on our uplands. Our village has signed the bird-bond of peace. A piece of winding road not a hundred yards in length will show from forty to fifty nests. But the feud goes on with the river dwellers. It is our trout and salmon that draw our most distinguished visitors, and whispered whittlings of their strange doings go round the fireside at the evening gatherings. Only this week lame Betty, unable to resist a curious impulse, saw through the hotel window two ladies in marvellous gowns sucking at their cigarettes—"puffing like chimneys." The news sent a painful shock through our unsophisticated community, and explains the fervour of prayer at the chapel, "seiet" on the Sabbath night. Then there are the otter hunts when the élite of the county bustle through the valley, and our hobbledehoy's enjoy a rare exaltation by becoming pals with the highest in the land. It is by way of the river distinction arrives. Do we not quote how Sir William Jones, who traversed the East from Mount Everest to Fusi-yama, found nought so rare as that "fair Teivy" he celebrated in stilted verse? Nowhere in far Ind is aught so charming by irrefutable testimony as "thy wild oaken woods and green eglantine bowers, thy banks with the blush-rose and amaranth glowing." We don't know what the eglantine and amaranth exactly are, but they sound just the right words, being fine words, being grand words such as our own bards parade. For we read our bards. So prolific is the poetic output that though the population is sparse, and no big industry mars the quiet of our rural life, it has been found necessary to establish a printing-press in the village to cope with local demands. We have achieved the glory of printing and binding 350 pages of history of our parish. A monthly magazine issues from the same press, and the numerous eistedh-vodau and lectures by itinerant wits keep the ticket, programme and handbill department always going. Our streets are dimly lit by oil-lamps; our water has to be carried from two wells a mile apart, but our daily greetings in the field and on the highway are quotations from the poets, and our converse is of ancient kings.

For we have kept the past. The grace of remembrance is going out of vogue—the tender grace of a day that is dead. Men have grown too hurried to cultivate the past; the city folk are in too feverish haste to get on to allow them to get back. But in our village we have time to con the ancient legends, to recite the ancient tales. Perhaps we are not allowed to forget. The names of our hills and dales are fraught with mythology and history. "The Vale of Venus" (Pantolwen), the Crag of Vortigern (Craig Gwrtheyrn), and such like. When the five o'clock train goes out into the evening light, we are cut off from civilisation until next morning, and during this interim we gather around our hearths in confabulation, and gather in the glades in our dreams, going over the past. We are then an island, isolated from the rest of the world. We no longer engage in penillion-singing. The only harp in the place is mostly silent. For retrospect is sad. Even of our own days it is the doings of our deep buried years that matter. "Do you remember how we did so-and-so?" ask the old cronies of each other.

This habit of remembrance has its disadvantages. A Welshman can never forget a kindness. Some service done in the past will be rendered back to the third and fourth generation. But a wrong, by the same psychological process, will not fade out too easily. An act of injustice by some powerful squire will be kept alive for many a year, for the steel has penetrated deep down into the clan conscience and the clan soul. How many a heart-break is connected with some cursed proud name! "The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely, the insolence of office, and the spurns that patient merit of the unworthy takes"—these have our common people known too well in the past. Slowly, oh, so slowly, has the iron grip been released from upon our throat. Desolating tragedy! I heard the cry of the centuries of oppression in the voices of the singers who sang Pissuti and Gounod and Handel to-night. Our Choral Society is going away to compete at a Glamorgan Eistedh-vod, and the concert was got up to raise funds to meet their expenses. The honour of the village was at stake, and we crowded one of the chapels (the largest building in the place) to uncomfortable excess. The performance was of almost incredible excellence. And as I listened, like one held in thrall, I saw how, in order to make possible that dramatic imagination that interpreted every phase of tenderness and sympathy, of glowing passion and grim pain, all the tragedy of the past had been necessary. I saw it, but now transfigured by art. I saw it, and was content.

AN AGENCY FOR DUTCH GIRLS IN ENGLAND.

SIR,—While there are many orthodox societies in London to look after the needs of young foreigners, until now no organised effort has been made to specially look out for and befriend those who come here from the Liberal Churches abroad. Hitherto the numbers of young Dutch women belonging to Liberal religious families in Holland who want to come over for study or to get work have written to Mrs. Baarte de la Faille, the wife of the Liberal minister of the Dutch Church in London, for help and guidance. The International Committee of the League has determined to help Mrs. Baarte de la Faille in this work, undertaken, till now, by herself alone. Therefore the Anglo-Dutch Agency has been formed. Its object will be to bring these young Dutch people into communication with those of our own Liberal Christian public who would like to have Dutch girls as pupils or boarders, Dutch servants, mothers' helps or teachers, and so make it possible for them to find work and friends among people whose religious views are likely to be in sympathy with those in which they have been brought up.

It is hoped that the Agency will prove of mutual advantage. Those who know anything about Dutch educational matters testify to the exceedingly high standard of training and equipment required of the teaching profession in Holland, while the home training in all branches of domestic work compares more than favourably with that of the average English mother's help or servant. The agency is to be worked on a business footing, proper fees being charged. In time, it is expected to be self-supporting; meanwhile the Dutch Church in Austin Friars is contributing generously towards the initial expenses. It is to be noted that from both sides references will be required. This is not usual, but in face of the serious responsibility incurred by the League, the necessity for this rule will, we hope, be evident to all concerned. Everything connected with the Dutch side of the Agency is in the hands of Mrs. Baarte de la Faille, who is also a member of the International Committee. For prospectus and other information application must be made to the English agent:—Miss Arthur, 1A, Belsize-parade, Hampstead.—Yours, &c.,

THE LATE SIR EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE.

SIR,—A short appreciation of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence by one of his fellow Baconians may not be out of place in your paper. With regard to the Bacon-Shakespeare controversy it must suffice to state that the Baconians are mostly a well-informed, persistent body of men and women who spend much time in a careful investigation of the facts, for it is only after reading scores of books and magazine articles that one can fully appreciate the evidence. The anti-Baconians, on the other hand, are usually found to be people who have never read or perhaps never even heard of any books on the Baconian side. In addition, there are the newspaper hacks who write to the order of the editors. As the facts on the Baconian side cannot be answered or explained away, the weapon of ridicule has been adopted by the anti-Baconians, and it is rare indeed to find a serious article on the subject by any of them.

This weapon has proved more effective than might at first be supposed. The majority of mankind are so keenly sensitive to ridicule that they will do almost anything to avoid it. Hence most people are afraid to admit that they have any interest in the Bacon-Shakespeare subject. Carlyle in his essay on Dr. Johnson points out that the majority of mankind are like sheep—all rushing aimlessly together in one direction—and that Samuel Johnson was one of the few conspicuous individualistic men of his age. In Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence we had another. He was not afraid of ridicule. His enthusiasm for his subject sometimes carried him too far, and afforded openings for his opponents, but he was able to cover his retreat by fresh arguments that usually left him with the mastery. He was successful in convincing such a thorough student and doughty anti-Baconian as Mrs. Stopes that the five so-called Shakespeare signatures were none of them written by the man of Stratford. Sir Edwin Durning-

Lawrence may be said to have died in the cause, for his illness commenced with a fainting fit at the close of a lecture that he delivered during the week before his death. His book, "Bacon is Shakespeare," may be found in every important public library in the country.—Yours, &c.,

E. BASIL LUPTON.

8, Queen-square, Leeds, April 27, 1914.

[We are glad to publish this letter as a tribute to the memory of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, but we cannot open our columns to any discussion of the Bacon-Shakespeare controversy.—ED. of INQUIRER.]

THE WELSH CHURCH BILL.

SIR,—May I be permitted to compliment you on the ingenious, though I fear far from ingenuous manner in which last week you dealt with the Bill now before the House of Commons for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church in Wales, by devoting your editorial paragraphs to the question of disestablishment only, and ignoring the far more important matter of disendowment. The one is a subject for argument, and people may legitimately differ as to the wisdom or the reverse of disestablishment. The latter is to my mind a question of common honesty, and I am convinced I speak for a large number of your Unitarian readers when I protest against the position your paper adopts. How can you or I, who in the vast majority of cases by a twelve years' uninterrupted user of land, and in any case by thirty years' such user (however unfairly it may have been originally acquired) will become absolutely entitled thereto, pretend that we are justified in taking away possessions which the Church has held for many times that period—possessions, too, which it cannot be said to have in the first instance wrongfully gained? How can we Unitarians, who enjoy most of our endowments by virtue of a twenty-five years' profession of certain religious opinions, contemplate with other than dismay a proposal to confiscate property which the Church has held for from ten to fifteen times that length of time?

Is long and continuous possession to confer no title, or can it be said that the Church has so used its possessions to the injury of the State or of the people of this realm, as to justify confiscation? It is with the greatest astonishment, and the sincerest regret, that I see a paper which claims to be a religious one, and whose Editor would be deeply pained if he were told it was not, supporting a scheme which no one, who will look at it without sectarian bitterness or party rancour, can hold to be other than a discreditable act of national dishonesty.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN C. WARREN.

Nottingham.

[Mr. Warren is evidently very angry with us, and it is impossible to deny him the pleasure of seeing his letter in print. We cannot, however, understand how the very innocent statement which we made last week to the effect that the debate on the Welsh Church Bill was rendered memorable by the very able speech of the Attorney-General lays us open to the charge of sectarian bitterness and party rancour, and almost deprives us of any claim to be a "religious" paper.—ED. of INQUIRER.]

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE HISTORICAL CHRIST.

The Historical Christ; or, An Investigation of the Views of Mr. J. M. Robertson, Dr. A. Drews, and Prof. W. B. Smith. By Fred. C. Conybeare, M.A., F.B.A., LL.D. London: Watts & Co. 8s. 6d. net.

DR. CONYBEARE tells us in his preface that this book was written in the spring of 1913. Since then the storm that arose over the denial by Mr. J. M. Robertson and others of the historical existence of Jesus has almost passed away. Like some other storms, it has had a good effect. It has cleared the air, and, we believe, left the central figure of Christendom more plainly discernible as a historical reality than before. As, however, there are still those who think that Jesus was a sun-god, that the twelve disciples were the twelve signs of the Zodiac, and that the Gospels are but different versions of a ritual drama, we would commend to them this drastic and diverting examination of such views, and we should be much surprised if, after reading it, they remained of that persuasion. The plea which Dr. Conybeare makes for "moderation and good sense in dealing with the writings of early Christianity," should have a wholesome effect on minds which in the reaction against obscurantist doctrine have gone to the opposite extreme. But even those whose faith in the essential historicity of the New Testament records needs no confirmation should read this book for the sake of the pleasure and stimulus which so vigorous a piece of polemical writing can give, and for the profit of its solid and varied learning. Apart from its special purpose, it is an excellent essay in New Testament criticism, and would be worth studying even though the Jesus-myth controversy were as much a thing of the past as the ancient Gnostic one to which it bears in some respects a striking resemblance.

THE WAY AND THE WORK. A Manual for Sunday School Teachers. By J. H. Wimmis, M.A., B.Sc., and Frederic Humphrey. London: James Clarke & Co. 1s. 6d. net.

A BOOK we can heartily commend to all teachers. We like its hopeful outlook on the movement, and the high ideal it sets before the workers in it. The type of Sunday school the authors have in view is one which leads its scholars in the direction of the Church, and with this in view they emphasise the need for the Church to devote more time and attention to the school than it has hitherto done.

"The history of the Christian Church of to-morrow is being written in the Sunday schools of to-day, and upon the Christian Church of to-morrow rests the destiny of the world." The training in character which will lead the scholars to become definitely identified with the work of the Church of Christ is the scope and aim of the Sunday school. About half of the book is devoted to the consideration of the teacher and his methods. The greatest stress is laid—and rightly—on the question of personality. Apparently the writers would prefer to have a lesson, which according to critical standards is a poor one, but one in which the teacher impressed his own personality, if a good one, on his class, rather than a lesson, admirable in many points, but with the latter quality absent. The keynote of successful teaching—and this phrase occurs again and again—is: Study the children. Methods and machinery are good, but may be overstressed; the golden key to method is for the teacher to know the children of his class. Anything which tends to destroy the individuality of the teacher is to be avoided, and the machinery of the school must therefore be directed to strengthen this or it will do harm. In all our work the teacher must keep before him the life of the greatest of teachers. In Jesus are found characteristics of personality of the highest value. These are his personal magnetism, his power of adaptability, his power of suggestion and of stimulation. For the authors' point of view on methods we must refer to the book itself. Perhaps the highest praise we can give it is to say that it will probably compel anyone who reads it to ask the questions, "Am I fitted to be a Sunday school teacher?" "Have I studied my children?" "Have I a definite purpose in my work?" "Is that purpose the highest?" Such searching of heart will, we venture to think, be a good spiritual tonic.

LAST summer Messrs. Macmillan selected a dozen or so from among their most widely appreciated works on religion, and issued them in neat cloth-bound volumes under the title of "Macmillan's Shilling Theological Library." Evidently the venture met with success, for we note that the series is to be immediately augmented by the publication of six other books. These are Dr. J. R. Illingworth's "Christian Character," the Rev. Bernard Lucas's "Conversations with Christ," the Rev. William Temple's "Kingdom of God," Dean Kirkpatrick's "Divine Library of the Old Testament," Dr. F. J. A. Hort's "Christian Ecclesia," and Charles Kingsley's "True Words for Brave Men."

THE "Cambridge History of American Literature," which the Cambridge University Press has in preparation, will deal with American literature from colonial times to the present day, and will occupy two volumes supplementary to and modelled upon "The Cambridge History of English History." These volumes will be under the editorship of Professors W. P.

Trent, John Erskine, Carl Van Doren, and Stuart P. Sherman, who will enlist the services of contributors of special competence from among scholars and men of letters. The chief American writers will be treated in separate chapters, but emphasis will be laid on the periods of transition and development in American culture which have been in the main insufficiently studied hitherto, despite their importance to a full understanding of the national literature.

LIGHT-BRINGERS.

I COULD name, here and there among the people who touch my life in this world, certain persons who are "light-bringers." No doubt you can think of some also. They are not too numerous, indeed, and are sometimes to be found in quite unexpected places. But wherever they are and whoever they are, they have the power of lighting up dark places and making things look brightly different; just as the sun does when it shines out suddenly on a dark morning. They are wonderful people, these! Do you know what it feels like to be dark inside—naughty, or bothered, or angry, or disappointed, or afraid, or hurt? I expect you do; we all do, sometimes. And then do you know what it is to come into contact with a "light-bringer; to have a talk with one, or to receive a letter from one, or even to look at one, or to tell your troubles to one? And have you felt your gloominess passing away because of some wisdom or kindness or humorousness that he has shed into that dark place? Very likely you have done that in your young troubles. As for me, set in the midst of the perplexities of the grown-up world, I cannot even begin to tell you what I owe to the "light-bringers" whom I know. Some day you will understand that better, but even now you know something about it. Talking about light-bringers reminds me of an old custom—I suppose in these days of electric lighting it is the custom no longer—which used to obtain in the old town of Strasburg, and perhaps in other cathedral towns on the continent. The picture comes into my mind of a very wintry scene, dark except for glimmering lights in the windows and the shimmering white of a newly-fallen cover of snow. The streets, and the high gables where the storks will presently be in their nests, are all now under a silent mantle which glitters with crystals wherever a ray of light happens to fall. It is so cold and so early that you might expect everyone to be snug in bed. But instead of that the streets are alive with people all going one way. Friends meet and overtake one another, and there are merry greetings ringing in the frosty air; for this is Christmas morning, and everyone is cheery and happy and friendly.

People are trooping towards that great black mass with a tower which soars up and up to an untold height in the dark. Then they crowd in through the doors of the cathedral. It is like dropping into a black hole, so dark is it inside. No light gleams through the splendid stained windows at four o'clock in the morning. There is just a faint glow of light at what seems an immense distance, for on the High Altar candles are burning. But for these the great church is utterly dark. Are they not going to light it up, then, as the people stream in?

Watch! What are all these tiny trembling points of light making wavering garlands round the pillars, clustering in constellations, moving slowly up the vast aisles, filling the vistas and recesses with twinkling stars, shifting, advancing, receding, a multitude of dim jewels floating in the dark? So many of them there are that at last a luminous mist diffuses itself faintly, showing a mass of white faces all looking one way. Behind them for background are the black distances of the cathedral. What does it mean? Simply that every person coming to this Christmas service has brought his own light with him and is holding it in his hand.

Everyone is bearing a wax taper—a slender coil of red or white or yellow wax, twisted like a corkscrew with one end alight. He uncoils it and uncoils it as it gradually burns away.

There they stand, those people, holding their tiny lights amid the heavy shadows, with the mystery of the dark behind them and above them and their faint little illuminations. But while they give thanks for the coming of a great Light into this world, their own light rests on their faces.

What a picture of those "light-bringers" I spoke of!

And then when their praise and prayer to the Author of the light and of the dark are done, and their tapers are nearly burnt down, they pass out into the wintry city, and so to their homes. Once more the great church is left cold and dark and silent, to wait for the dawn.

Are you going to be a "light-bringer"—carrying the light, not in your hand, but in your heart, so that it shines not on but through your face and makes the world less dark wherever you are? I can think of nothing more lovely or more blessed. It is being indeed a reflection of God. A great English poet once said of just these people, these light-bringers:

By such souls as these God, stooping, shows sufficient of His light
For us i' the dark to rise by. And I rise.

MEMORIAL NOTICE

THE LATE SIR EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE.

THE funeral of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence took place on Saturday, April 25. A private service was held in the drawing room at 13, Carlton House-terrace, conducted by his old and intimate friend, the Rev. Alexander Gordon. Subsequently the interment took place in the family vault in Kensal Green Cemetery in presence of a numerous company of friends and representatives of various public bodies. At the graveside Mr. Gordon spoke as follows:—

"We pause a moment in this city of the dead, gathered in a solemn and sacred sadness to pay the last rites of reverence, the last tributes in token of tender regard for one, but yesterday a living force among us, now, on earth, a memory and a regret. Temporary, indeed, are the things that are seen. With us was the strong man, rejoicing in his strength, of firm resolve and purpose mature, manifold in his interests, accomplishments, activities, achievements, conspicuous for a wide range of genial gifts; the centre of his home, the pride of his church, the resort of admiring and respecting friends. Eternal are the things unseen. We bury a body; earth to earth, dust to dust. God has received a spirit, called home to the Father's house and heart. The everlasting arms, that were about him in this life, hold him in the firm embrace of Eternal Love."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY AND ABORIGINES PROTECTION SOCIETY. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society was held at the Westminster Palace Hotel on Thursday, April 23, Sir T. Fowell Buxton, President, in the chair. In moving the adoption of the report the chairman said there were those who thought that slavery did not now exist, but this was a mistake. Slavery was in a very flourishing condition in many parts of the world, especially in the Angola district, but the Foreign Office were right-minded about the matter, and were anxious to abolish any pretence of slavery wherever it existed. A sub-committee had been appointed to watch affairs in South America and the Putumayo. In regard to the New Hebrides, which had much occupied their attention of late, it was satisfactory to know that the French Government had indicated a readiness to join forces so that there should be some common action to bring about more decent government there.

Admiral Sir George King-Hall seconded the resolution, and speaking from personal experience as late Commander-in-Chief of the Australian station, said the condition of things in the New Hebrides was scandalous. The condominium was an utter failure—a dead letter on the part of the French. The British Government is, however, negotiating with the French Government for a new conference with a view to altering the convention and preventing some of the scandalous actions which are now taking place. The illicit liquor traffic with the natives should and could be put down with an iron hand, and the judgments of the condominium should be enforced and properly carried out. The speaker was of opinion that if both Governments would nominate a commission composed of prominent men to look into the state of affairs in the New Hebrides there would soon be a great amelioration of conditions in those islands. The resolution was carried.

In the absence of Sir Harry Johnston, who was unable to be present, extracts from the speech which he intended to deliver were read by Mr. Travers Buxton, secretary. Sir Harry wished emphatically to recommend the work of the Society to those who deemed themselves Imperialists, and realised the extent, the resources, the potentialities for good or ill, the responsibilities of the British Empire. There are some 830,000,000 of the non-Caucasian race in the world who are either uncultured or backward or retrograde in their mode of life, and out of this total at least 365,000,000, nearly half the number, dwelt within the limits of the British Empire or its sphere of political influence. We could destroy most of them by warfare with modern weapons, by disease, by alcohol, by over-taxation and famine, by deprivation of land and personal freedom; but were we so sure that we could plant in their place a European population which would prove as suitable to climate and surroundings? If therefore we were not going to exterminate, we must protect, educate, uplift and encourage the aboriginal populations, and continue the work carried on for the last hundred years by Christian missionaries. So long as the Anti-Slavery Society pursued its activities, those who lived at home might rest assured that no great wrong was being done in secret, no awful outbreak of revenge was smouldering to burst out uncontrollably. It worked cordially with all Christian missionary societies because its work was typically Christian in character. During its seventy or eighty years of existence it had averted, amended or atoned for much wrongdoing in our Indian and Colonial policy, and its example had led to the creation of similar societies in France, Germany, Belgium, the United States, and Brazil. To take an interest in it was really in the nature of an insurance.

A resolution protesting against the arbitrary arrest of the Rev. J. S. Bowskill in Portuguese West Africa, expressing satisfaction that the Portuguese Government had abandoned its charges against him, and urging that the Portuguese Government should be informed that any British subject calling attention to abuses akin to slavery is performing a duty imposed by the General Act of Berlin, to which the Portuguese nation was signatory, was proposed by Mr. S. J. G. Hoare, M.P. The speaker made special reference to the changed attitude of the Foreign Office as illustrated by the White Paper already alluded to, and by the fact that during the last few months a vice-consul had been appointed specially to inquire into the conditions of labour. They were bringing pressure to bear upon the Portuguese Government to make the repatriation of the contract labourers a real thing instead of the sham that it has been in the past. As members of that Society their actions had been justified, but they must not rest content. It was their duty to see that the United Kingdom was in no way connected by treaty or anything else with a European state that allowed such a condition of things to exist as they had exposed. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. J. H. Harris, who said that the White Paper was a triumphant vindication of all those who had for the past six years charged the Portuguese Government with permitting slave-owning and slave-trading. The country owed to Sir Edward Grey and the British Foreign Office, and the British consuls now on the spot, a debt of gratitude for completely unmasking the hideous condition of slave-owning which prevails in Portuguese West Africa; but this complete official exposure imposed upon public opinion the duty of redoubling its efforts to set the slaves free. Since 1908 they had secured the liberation of nearly 4,000 slaves, but they would not rest content until the rate of emancipation was the carrying capacity of the available shipping. Finally, they must watch the new form of slavery now introduced, which was first detected by Lord Cromer, and for the exposing of which Mr. Bowskill was arrested, viz., forced labour for private profit officially organised by the Portuguese local administration. The resolution was carried.

Mr. Douglas Hall, M.P., moved a resolution that the recent disclosures of abuses connected with the employment of native labour in different parts of the world show that there is great need for the consolidation and extension of the Slave Trade Acts, and calling upon the Government to introduce a Bill for this purpose into Parliament at an early date. In the course of his remarks he said that the history of the Peruvian Amazon Company was not an isolated case, but typical of many similar companies throughout South America, and it was above everything necessary that they should have some legislation which should make directors in England and their officials responsible for the way in which the dividends were produced.

The Rt. Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P., in seconding the resolution, said that he feared the atrocities they were trying to expose, and similar evils, would go on if the great cause of them all, the greed for wealth, was not checked. The cruelties perpetrated in South America on a peaceful, docile, and intelligent people, who are much beloved by the missionaries working amongst them, were not exceeded by the cruelties which had been practised in the Middle Ages. They must see to it that wealth was procured for a civilised country according to civilised and humane methods. There must be a reconstruction of their ideas in regard to forced labour and slavery, and an extension of the law of England so as to make British subjects responsible for a greater number of malfeasances in other countries than at present. Another proposal was that treaties should be revised, and that, if we define slavery on a broader basis, we should try and get other nations to accept our definition. Our example, if we carry out these ideas, would open the eyes of the public. The proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Canon Masterman and seconded by Mr. Grubb.

IBSEN'S "BRAND."

PERFORMANCE AT MANCHESTER UNIVERSITY.

"BRAND," to be performed at the Whitworth Hall by the Manchester University Stage Society, in Professor Herford's metrical version, indicated an occasion of such enterprise and importance that one might have prophesied an invasion of Manchester by literary Liverpool. Liverpool, however, remaining on the whole coldly unconscious, is the poorer for that, and once more Manchester scores intellectually over Liverpool. "Brand" presents such enormous difficulties from the point of view of the theatrical manager, and is of such inordinate length, that only the fourth Act has ever before been attempted in England. And though the fourth Act is the culmination of the action it is, as Professor Herford says, as incomprehensible without its context as would be the fifth Act of "Othello" without the elucidating progress of the tragedy. The version given in Manchester was arranged by Professor Herford from his own translation in the original metres, and comprised all the vital portion of the action up to the tragic climax closing the fourth Act. The fifth Act was entirely omitted.

To be interested—the event promised the spectator that; but that he should find himself astonished, exhilarated, thrown into increased and special mental interrogation by something that was a great sermon on the one hand and remained still a great exercise of Art on the other—that was hardly to be expected. Yet that happened. "Brand" was a thrilling and discomfiting experience, bringing an impression of being battered about the brain by unanswerable questions, but questions which must be secretly answered somehow. In the first place one hardly expected a convincing Brand. The Superman is difficult to convey without shocking you, or alienating you, or amusing you, or exasperating you. Mr. Shelley simply conquered you. There, to your amazement, was Brand, human after all, in the very atmosphere of authenticity. To say that

Miss Gertrude Cock's Agnes did not seize and convince in quite the same way—that her light was not so illuminating as the fire of Brand was burning—is only to make a concession to the probabilities of things. But she, too, rose to the almost impossible demands of the fourth Act. She held the tremendous situation in a kind of suppressed intensity, which was even furthered by her lack of action or movement and her curiously level voice. You saw the simple nakedness of the issue, stripped of everything inessential: the dreadful completeness of All or Nothing.

Here lay the triumph of the representation after all—not in the artistic values of the acting so much as the inevitable manner in which it forced home the question: Is Brand right in his terrific contentions? That was the thing that came away with one and refused the answers of comfortable commonplaces. "He who sees Jehovah dies." Is that the inaccessible secret which the Brands of this world know, and we small and average people, swathed in our placid religious gentilities, never guess? Is spiritual truth narrowed down to (or widened out to) just this? Is Life nothing, only the thing lived for? Are our admirations, loves and hopes for all the wistful content of this "pleasing, anxious being" beside the mark? Are the dear earthly relationships snares of idolatry? Are the long dream of art, and the poet's vision and the discoverer's joy, mere delusions? Are the beauty of the earth, and the exultation of love and life, and the thrill of mental and physical powers, and the impulses of human kindness for its own sweet sake, and work for the world for the world's sake, and love of men for men's sake, and laughter and tears mere trifling in face of that single and awful demand? Is all virtue except negative virtue a temptation of the ego? Are our thought of the great motive forces of the world, and our new conviction of creativity, and our eager exploitation of the great fact of life, and our new triumphs of knowledge—nothing?

"Love," said one poet whom we have called a seer, "is victory, the prize itself." "The victory of victories," says Brand, "is to lose all. In your loss of all lies your gain; that alone is possessed for ever which is lost." Jesus said that he who lost his life saved it. Which has beheld the reality? Which has entered into the Presence? Is Brand an ironic figure to us and to his Creator? Or is he

The high that proved too high, the heroic for earth too hard,
The passion that left the ground to lose itself in the sky?

Who knows? Not Ibsen. But beside this Titan and this amour de l'impossible, our "religious" contentions and conventions and ambitions, wherein we fuss daily before the hosts of heaven, have a futile and puerile air. And that glimpse of reality at least is good for us.

The setting of this achievement was a triumph. "No attempt has been made," according to the programme, "at realistic scenery, since such would be incongruous with the ideal plane on which the action takes place." The lighting, and suggestion of peak and glacier, in fact, encouraged the sense of remoteness to an extraordinary degree. It appears that all the production was without professional help.

F. R.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

NEITHER the Futurists nor the Cubists have as yet captured the Royal Academy, so that we can still visit it without the least fear of being confronted with fantastic disharmonies in colour that set the teeth on edge, or affrighted by visions of inhuman-looking beings with limbs and faces shaped like triangles. We may complain that the same kind of pictures are to be met with year by year, and urge that some slight sign of contact with new ideas and social forces would not be amiss on the crowded walls of Burlington House; but it will be a consolation to most of us that, at least, our painters have not entirely lost their sanity and become victims of nightmares and hallucinations. One thing is, perhaps, more noticeable than in previous years—a greater freedom and audacity in the use of colour. Mr. R. Jack is particularly lavish in this direction, and Mr. Lavery, who is represented by one big picture only, "The Studio of the Painter," quietly revels in it, the subtle blending of purples and reds and a peculiarly satisfying blue in the dress of his principal figure being a remarkable achievement. Mr. Hornel, however, whose decorative studies of nature and child-life are always charming, is one for whom a common greyness will always silver everything, and in his "Voices in the Woodland" the leaves of the trees and the blades of grass still refuse to be green, and even the primroses have a faded and decadent appearance.

As usual, there are many pleasant English interiors, sunny gardens full of roses, pictures of pretty girls reading love-letters, spring pastoral scenes, and Venetian studies—several fine landscapes, too, by Arnesby Brown, R. Vicat-Cole, Alfred Parsons (whose "Avalon" is a restful thing to look upon), H. Hughes Stanton, Peter Graham, George Clausen, the late Sir Alfred East, and Sir Ernest Waterlow, who has found his chief inspiration amidst Alpine snows. Among the best portraits are Cope's "The Viscount Haldane," and Sargent's "The Lady Rocksavage," and "Henry James, Esq.," which will delight those who have missed his portraits of late years; and there are, of course, some beautiful pictures by Mr. J. W. Waterhouse, Sir E. J. Poynter, and Arthur Hacker. As usual the genius of Sargent easily asserts itself in any room where a picture of his is hung, and his "Cypresses and Pines" and "Sketchers" are very brilliant achievements. It is a constant source of wonder to the uninitiated how he can convey the effect of glowing light, a burning blue sky, and a riot of flowers by means of hard dabs of colour which the brush appears to have left in haste, and which have no meaning whatever while you are near enough to examine them closely.

The Hon. John Collier, who usually sends a picture which "tells its own tale," or propounds a very simple enigma, has baffled the expectations of the public this season with his conventional "Clytemnestra." The attention of those who are looking for something which they can claim as the picture of the year, however, will probably be bestowed upon the picture of Lucrezia Borgia enthroned in the Vatican in the absence of Pope Alexander VI., who gave her permission to open his letters and transact business for him, by F. Cadogan Cowper. It is an amazing piece of work, rendered specially striking by the lavish red of the Cardinal's robes, the curiously motionless figure of the young girl offering her foot to be kissed, the grouping of the ecclesiastics, and the extraordinary minuteness with which the tessellated floor, the paintings on the wall, the trappings of the throne and the decorated ceiling have been rendered. But the whole thing is as smooth as enamel, and conveys a sense of airless and sinister magnificence which is rather fatiguing. In the Central Hall, amidst the huge statues of Lord Curzon (there are two of them, both for India); Captain Cook, a statue to be erected in the Mall near the new Admiralty arch; King Edward, and the late Maharajah of Bikaner, is the interesting memorial to Margaret MacDonald to be placed in Lincoln's Inn Fields, with its bevy of laughing little children in bronze running joyously from the protecting arms of a gracious maternal figure. Near by is the Countess Gleichen's "Florence Nightingale"—the familiar "lady with the lamp"—J. Keller's curious group "Destiny," and Mr. Charles L. Hartwell's fine "Dawn," which suffers from its proximity to the statues of eminent men above mentioned, and the want of space and a suitable background.

LETTERS OF JOHN BRIGHT.

GIFT TO MANCHESTER BY LADY DURNING-LAWRENCE.

A VALUABLE and interesting collection of letters, papers, pamphlets, and other MSS collected by the late Mr. John Benjamin Smith, who was an intimate friend of Bright, Cobden, Villiers, and others who were so prominent in agitating for the repeal of the Corn Laws, has recently been given to the Manchester Libraries Committee by his daughter, Lady Durning-Lawrence. Mr. Smith was at one time Member of Parliament for the Stirling district, and afterwards for the borough of Stockport. He was closely associated with the business life of Manchester, and wrote several books about its banking, trade, and commerce. We understand from the Manchester Guardian that the collection has been bound in 34 volumes, and it is regarded by the Libraries Committee as a mine of interesting things associated with the political history of the country during the mid-Victorian period. There are important references in the correspondence to the beginnings of the Owens College, now the University of Manchester, for Mr. Smith was nominated under the will of John Owens (who died in July, 1846) as a trustee "under a bequest for educational purposes of very considerable importance"—to quote from the lawyers' letter to Mr. Smith announcing his nomination—"to the inhabitants of the borough and neighbourhood of Manchester."

Some light is thrown on Mr. Cobden's methods as a public speaker in one of Bright's letters, dated April 14, 1865: "I do not think (Mr. Bright wrote) that our lamented friend (Cobden) ever wrote out anything for a speech, and I feel sure that nothing will be found that will serve me to speak on the Canadian question." In the same letter Mr. Bright expresses his opinion as to the probable line that Canada would take after the American War if she had to defend her frontiers. "I am watching this question with much interest," Mr. Bright goes on. "I expect the 'confederation scheme' will break down, and I believe there will be a great tendency to annexation with the States rather than to raise taxes and spend money to defend Canada from a war which will be, not a Canadian, but an English and Imperial war."

In a letter to Mr. Smith, dated January 7, 1866, Mr. Bright wrote: "I suppose the Reform Club has no higher idea than that of getting into the Cabinet, which doubtless is a temporary exaltation for some men. I quoted Horace Walpole at Birmingham—'some men wade through dirt to dignities.' To me the notion of going into the Cabinet is repulsive. As a matter of inclination or will I could not discuss it or deliberate upon it for one minute. But I dare say I shall not need to discuss it, though, judging from the letters I receive, my friends seem to be discussing it freely." In the Ministry formed by Mr. Gladstone in 1868 Mr. Bright became President of the Board of Trade and afterwards Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETING.

ON Saturday evening last, at Essex Hall, the sixth Annual Young People's Meeting was held. Organised by the London District Unitarian Society, the meeting was alive and enthusiastic. Light refreshments were served at 7 o'clock, and by 7.30 more than a couple of hundred young people from the various London churches and Missions were in attendance. The chair was taken by the President of the Society, Mr. A. Savage Cooper, who was supported by Miss Edith Wilson, Miss Grace Mitchell, Mr. T. M. Chalmers, Rev. A. H. Biggs, Mr. Ronald Bartram (Secretary), and Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (District Minister). After the hearty singing of the first hymn, "O God, in whom we live and move," the young people were welcomed by the President on behalf of the Society. In sympathetic terms he proceeded to refer to the recent loss of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence. It was fitting, he said, in that place and on that occasion that they should pause for a moment to mark their sense of loss sustained by the passing away of such a sturdy champion of the cause as Sir Edwin. They thought of his fearless advocacy of Unitarianism as the only free path to the truth of God, and the remembrance of such a man must stimulate them to greater activity in the furtherance of their faith and work on behalf of humanity. From his life they learned a lesson of hope, and from his example they drew inspiration to nobler things. If they did their part nobly and unselfishly, seeking always to give and to do, there was glorious hope for the future. Young people had a right to things enjoyable and beautiful, but these rights implied corresponding duties. Much joy came from the giving of oneself to a cause.

Miss Grace Mitchell gave one or two impressions of her recent travels among the Unitarian churches in South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. She urged her hearers to form as many links as possible between themselves and the colonial churches. One means of linking-up lay in the case of any friend who had emigrated. Those at home must keep in touch with the emigrant and let the speaker or Mr. Chalmers know the destination, when an introduction would be given to our churches on the other side of the water. Another friendly link was by writing letters to friends in those distant churches not only about our church and Sunday school work, but also about matters of general interest. Again, some among her audience might feel the call to the ministry, and the speaker most earnestly hoped they would respond, for ministers were needed.

Mr. T. M. Chalmers was glad to be present to see what London could do, and to find enthusiasm and helpfulness as much in evidence as in Liverpool, Manchester, Nottingham, or Birmingham. In reading a recent account of Japan, of the beauty of which country many of them knew, he discovered something which he did not quite expect. It told of children who were shut up for three years in cotton mills that ran day and night, and who were working double the hours they ought. He wondered if the progress which had come over the world was real. Following upon this, his mind recalled an account of conditions in England, where, detail after detail, similar things were proved. On thinking over those two reports a wonderful feeling of hope and satisfaction came to him, because the English report was dated sixty years ago, and he could mark what progress had been made in sixty years. More volunteers were needed; and chapels and schools existed not merely to worship in, or to be taught in, but to become centres of light, beauty, and religion.

The other speakers were Miss Edith Wilson, the Rev. J. A. Pearson, and Mr. Ronald Bartram. Mr. Pearson reminded his hearers that they belonged to a great country and to a small church, but in that church had been strong men and glorious women. He urged them to respond to the appeals made that evening. Whilst they would become increasingly strong in their faith, that faith would be shown by an enlarging interest in all that concerned the moral, spiritual, and physical welfare of their fellows.

THE third annual meeting of the British Council in connection with the Associated Councils of Churches in the British and German Empires for Fostering Friendly Relations between the Two Peoples, will be held on Friday, May 8, at the Westminster Palace Hotel, at 3 p.m., the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. The speakers will be the Rev. Dr. Lahusen, Head of the Lutheran State Churches in Berlin, Herr Director Dr. Spiecker, President of the German Council, Berlin; Cardinal Bourne, the Rev. Archibald Fleming, D.D.; and the Rev. F. L. Wiseman, President of the National Free Church Council. Prince Lichnowsky, German Ambassador, has agreed to be present.

UNDER the Ratan Tata Foundation a course of nine lectures on "Social Progress in the Light of Recent Research" will be delivered at the London School of Economics and Political Science, Clare Market, Kingsway, by Dr. J. H. Muirhead (Professor of Philosophy, Birmingham University) on Fridays, beginning May 1, at 6 p.m. The lectures are open to the public without fee.

THE seventy-ninth annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society will be held at the Bell-street Mission, Edgeware-road, on Wednesday evening, May 6, at 8 o'clock. The Rev. F. K. Freeston will take the chair, and the speakers will include Mrs. Moon, Miss Anthony, the Missionaries, Mr. Frank Morris, and the Rev. A. Golland, who is succeeding Mr. Farley at Bell-street. A farewell will be given at this meeting to the Rev. R. P. Farley, and a welcome to his successor, the Rev. Arthur Golland.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Ashton.—The annual conversazione of the North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union was held at Ashton on Saturday, April 25, and was attended by about 80 teachers and friends. At the evening meeting the vice-president, the Rev. H. E. Perry, presided, supported by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., the Rev. J. Morley Mills (president of the Manchester District Sunday School Association), and Mr. A. Slater (hon. secretary). Mr. Mills responded to a cordial welcome on behalf of his Association, and delivered a helpful address on Sunday-school work. A musical programme followed.

Astley.—Annual school sermons were preached on April 26 by the Rev. E. Morgan, B.A. The collections amounted to over £28.

Deptford.—A memorial service was held at the General Baptist Unitarian Church, Church-street, on Sunday evening last, in memory of the late Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence. The service was conducted by the minister, Mr. E. A. Carlier. Special hymns were sung, and appropriate music was rendered by the organist and choir.

Dudley.—On his return home after his recent marriage, the Rev. E. Glyn Evans and Mrs. Evans were cordially welcomed at a meeting held by the Old Meeting House congregation, and were the recipients of suitable gifts from the congregation, the Sewing Society and the Young People's Guild.

Ilford.—On Sunday, April 26, the anniversary services were held in connection with the Ilford Unitarian Sunday school. In the morning suitable hymns were sung, and the minister, the Rev. A. H. Biggs, M.A., gave a special address to the children, and later a sermon to parents and teachers. In the afternoon the church was crowded. Special music was rendered, and an address delivered by Mr. Stanley Mossop (of the Pioneer Preachers). Thanks are due to Mr. Gibbs, the church organist, who kindly officiated at the organ; and to Miss N. J. Patmore, who has helped greatly on Sunday mornings with the practising of the hymns. A small bunch of cowslips was worn by every child and teacher. The evening service was conducted as usual by the minister.

Ilminster.—The celebration of the completion scheme for a new organ and other improvements at the Old Meeting took place on April 16. The expenditure amounted to £883 6s. 10d., and the receipts to £885 1s. 8d. The proceedings began with a service in the chapel, the preacher being the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, D.D., of Oxford. The members and visitors then took tea in the school by invitation of Colonel Blake, the chairman of the congregation. After tea a meeting was held in the chapel, Colonel Blake presiding. In his address the chairman sketched the history of the scheme, and expressed his great satisfaction that the plans had been fully accomplished. In undertaking the improvements the character of the building was carefully observed, so that nothing that was done should be inconsistent with its style, and they had succeeded in this respect. The treasurer, Mr. R. P. Wheadon, having presented his balance-sheet, a short address was given by the Rev. W. Holmshaw, and congratulations to the congregation on the success of their efforts were spoken by the Revs. C. E. Pike, A. Sutcliffe, and J. E. Odgers. An organ recital by Mr. Rest Cartwright, the builder of the new organ, followed, and was greatly enjoyed.

Ipswich.—A meeting was held for the purpose of bidding farewell to the Rev. A. Golland, M.A., on Thursday, April 23, in the lecture room of the Unitarian Church, Mr. G. J. Notcutt presiding. Mr. Golland has been minister of the church for over four years, and is leaving in order to take up work in London at the Bell-street Mission. On behalf of a considerable number of friends and supporters a presentation of a clock and a purse of gold was made to Mr. and Mrs. Golland by the chairman, who referred to Mr. Golland's work at Ipswich in very appreciative terms. His words were endorsed by Mr. W. J. Scopes, who has been associated with the chapel since 1851, and held the office of warden for upwards of 50 years. Mr. R. Hamblin spoke of Mr. Golland's valuable services as secretary of the Eastern Union of Free Christian Churches, and other speakers were Mr. R. J. Collett, secretary of the church, Mr. G. S. Parkinson, Mr. G. T. Moss, J.P., and Mr. A. J. Hamblin. The Rev. A. Golland suitably replied.

Kilburn.—The fifth annual drill and gymnastic display of the Unity Boys' and Girls' Clubs, connected with the Kilburn Unitarian Church, will take place on Friday, May 8, at 8 p.m., in Unity Hall, Quex-road, N.W., when Mr. Percy Preston will preside and distribute the prizes. Tickets, 1s. each, can be obtained from the hon. secretary at the hall.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—The service was conducted, and an impressive address given on the subject of "Mysticism," by the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, of Highgate, at the monthly meeting of the Union on Monday, April 27. Mr. Charlesworth distinguished between three forms of religion in which the intellectual, the practical, and the contemplative aspects, respectively, were exaggerated. Unitarianism had the reputation of being too "intellectual" for ordinary folk. This, of course, was nonsense; but it was true that our tendency was to look at everything from the intellectual point of view. We were generally delighted to have an opportunity of giving reasons for our faith, and also for dissenting from other people's views. At its best, however, this passion for intellectual veracity represented a desire to put ourselves in the most favourable attitude for obtaining new revelations of God, by rejecting all that was consciously false, and by seeking always to face the facts. After all, our churches were not discussion societies; the object of our worship was to get nearer to God, and to enjoy a fuller realisation of His Presence. The mystical element in religion was just this personal, direct experience of God. It was no more communicable or explicable than the flashes of insight by which the great author, philosopher, and historian are able to find the meaning and significance of the materials on which they work; but it dominated the whole life when it had come. It offered no ready-made solution of the intellectual problems of evil, but it made optimism natural; it convinced men that the world was essentially good. At its highest it drove men and women into the world, not away from it—to work out what they believed to be the Will of God in their own day. As preachers we might often help men by explanations of difficult problems of thought and conduct, but our deepest value must lie hid in the ability to speak with power and conviction out of our own vital experience of God. A short conference followed at which Mr. Charlesworth replied to questions.

South-east Wales Unitarian Society.—The annual meeting of the above Society was held in the Swansea Unitarian Church, on Monday, April 27, when representatives were present from nearly all the affiliated churches. Mr. John Lewis presided over the proceedings. The hon. secretary, the Rev. W. J. Phillips, presented the Committee's report, which contained an interesting and encouraging survey of the work done by the Society during the year. The report stated: "At a time when Christian Churches are pretty generally lamenting a serious decline in church membership, it is gratifying to record that most of our churches have a happier record to relate." The Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., presented the treasurer's report, which was very satisfactory. When Mr. Jones took office about a year ago the Society was faced with a big adverse balance, which greatly handicapped it in its work. At the close of 1913 there was a balance in hand. Mr. John Lewis presented the report of the Postal Mission, while reports were also submitted by the Lay Workers' Union and the Sunday School Committee. The various reports were adopted, and will be printed for circulation. The Rev. Simon Jones was elected president of the Society for the ensuing year, Mr. Gomer L. Thomas being elected to fill his place as treasurer. The Rev. W. J. Phillips and the Rev. E. R. Dennis were re-elected hon. secretary and assistant hon. secretary respectively. The Executive Committee, which was also elected, consists of one member from each affiliated church. A small sub-committee was also selected to consider and prepare a scheme for new and extended missionary work in the autumn of the present year. A resolution was passed stating that "the Society wishes to place on record its cordial appreciation of the services rendered by the Rev. John Davies to the cause of free religious thought in South Wales, remembers with appreciation the devotion and ability which he has shown in his religious work during a period of over 50 years, and hopes that his remaining years on earth may be serene and happy, and blessed by the contemplation of a life devoted to a noble cause." At the close of the annual meeting a public conference was held, presided over by the President. The Rev. Richard Jones, M.A., Llandinam, a prominent minister among the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, read a paper on "The Churches and Social Questions." Subsequently a religious service was held, conducted by the Rev. W. T. Lucan-Davies, of Newport, the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Birmingham, being the preacher.

Southend.—The services at Westcliff and Southend were conducted on Sunday, April 26, by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, minister of the Southern Provincial Assembly. After the evening service at the Darnley-road Church a meeting of the congregation was held to pass a resolution of sympathy with Lady Durning-Lawrence. Mr. Drummond referred in a short speech to the great indebtedness of the congregation to the sympathy and help of the late Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence. From the time when the church was founded by the Rev. Thomas Spears he had been its constant friend, and he had not only been a benefactor on a large scale to many causes in which he was interested, but had shown the true spirit of generosity by numerous gifts in cases of need which he preferred should be entirely anonymous. Mr. T. Sloman, the treasurer of the congregation, also spoke, and recalled the fact that the present iron building in which they met for worship was his gift. The resolution placing on record the sense of personal loss at his death, and of deep sympathy with Lady Durning-Lawrence in her bereavement was passed, all standing. The morning services at the Crowstone Gymnasium, Westcliff-on-Sea, have now been continued for three months, with fair results. It has been decided to place this movement and the evening service at the Darnley-road Church under the care of the Pioneer Preachers for an experimental period. They will begin their work on Sunday, May 3, Mr. F. Cottier and Mr. Mossop being chiefly responsible.

Warrington.—A congregational soiree was held on Monday evening, April 27, in the Cairo-street schools, to bid farewell to the Rev. Dr. Stanley A. Mellor, who is leaving to take up his new duties at Hope-street Church, Liverpool. Mr. F. W. Monks presided, and in the course of his remarks said that Dr. Mellor had presented religion and the results of a truly religious life in altogether a different aspect from what they had been accustomed to listen to. The view was extremely inspiring, and was likely to have good and permanent results in carrying on the work for which the chapel and Sunday school had stood for so many years. Mr. Alfred Perris read the following resolution:—"This meeting of members of the congregation and school desire to express to Dr. and Mrs. Mellor their appreciation of the services they have rendered to the chapel and school during their residence amongst us, and to wish them 'God speed' in the work they are now taking up in Liverpool, and a happy and prosperous future." Mr. Perris said he regretted that Dr. Mellor's stay in Warrington had been so short, but his ministry had been a great one in the history of the congregation. It was bordering upon 40 years since he (Mr. Perris) first came to Warrington, but he could not remember such a short period being taken up in such a remarkable manner as these two years had been, and Dr. Mellor had stirred up Warrington to an extent which had not been known for some time. The resolution was supported by Mr. D. Plinston, and unanimously approved. Dr. Mellor was then presented with a cheque on behalf of the members of the chapel and schools. Dr. Mellor, in the course of his reply, said that he had a sort of idea that the congregation he desired to speak to was not limited to a particular place, or to a particular time. Life was a sort of adventure, and one, as it were, went along the road and took up people who were more or less like themselves, people who wanted the same thing, and had the same thoughts and feelings. For a while they travelled the road with others, and the ways apparently divided, but they did not really divide, because the association of thought and feeling remained eternal and continuous.

Woolwich.—At the conclusion of a sermon on "The Christ we Love," preached at the Unitarian Chapel on Sunday, April 26, the Rev. D. Delta Evans briefly alluded to the late Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence. He had, he said, stood the previous day with many others in reverent silence at the open grave of one whose genuine love of humanity and kindly disposition have helped to heal many an aching heart, and to raise many a drooping spirit among people of all creeds and conditions. His religion was the religion of service; his faith was a vital, real, practical faith. He was a Unitarian because he believed in that Christ of humanity the spirit of whose teaching is yet to lead the world onwards until his prophetic vision of a kingdom of truth and righteousness and brotherhood and love is realised in human hearts and in the great heart of the world; the Christ whose influence lives and thrills and works in all true men and women of all creeds and of none, and is potent to make us each and all preachers and interpreters of the glorious revelation of that kingdom of heaven on earth whose universal bond of union is belief—deep, strong, and active—in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

ANGLO-GERMAN FRIENDSHIP.

A cordial tribute of honour was paid to Sir Frank Lascelles on Tuesday evening by the members of the British-German Friendship Society. His experience as British Ambassador to Berlin for many years adds weight to his assurance that there is no ground of quarrel between the two countries which would not be susceptible of arrangement by the ordinary diplomatic methods, and certainly none which would justify a war. It should be clearly understood, he said, that that friendship with Germany which they all desired should not be taken as indicating hostility to any other country. What they wanted was friendship all round. Because England was friends with one country was no reason why she should not be friends with the others, and the arrangements she had entered into with France and Russia were no bar to a friendly understanding with Germany.

THE IRISH WORKERS' DRAMATIC SOCIETY.

On Friday, May 8, the first performance will be given of the Irish Workers' Dramatic Society, which has been formed for the purpose of raising funds in aid of Miss Delia Larkin's Co-operative Scheme for establishing small shops, restaurants, and blouse-and-skirt making establishments to relieve the distress among women and girls in Dublin thrown out of work by the recent strike. Miss Larkin is the sister of the well-known leader of the Irish transport workers, and she seems to have a good deal of his energy, enterprise, and dramatic ability. Her anxiety to improve the conditions of women wage-earners in Dublin has resulted in really practical methods of organisation, and in two years the membership of the Women's Union of which she is the secretary, has risen to 6,000. At the performance on May 8, which will take place at King's Hall, Covent Garden, William Boyle's three-act comedy, "The Building Fund," and Lady Gregory's play, "The Workhouse Ward," will be given, in addition to Irish songs and dances, and selections by Irish War Pipers in native costume. The King's Hall being unlicensed, tickets can only be obtained by members of the Society, and no money can be taken at the doors. Further details will be supplied by Miss Seruya (secretary), 21, Tudor-street, E.C., or by Miss V. Tillard, International Women's Franchise Club, 9, Grafton-street, W.

SHAKESPEARE'S BIRTHDAY.

Perfect weather contributed to the success of the Shakespeare birthday celebrations, which were carried out with due ceremony at Stratford-on-Avon last week, and the American Ambassador, who proposed Shakespeare's memory at the luncheon, struck the right note when he emphasised the wide appeal which he has made and is still making to men of all nations, creeds, political opinions, and social theories. It was, he said, startling to think that nothing had happened in the last three centuries that had made a single character in his plays stale. The educated classes in all languages knew him, and in all English and German-speaking lands he was a part of the common speech of all men, learned and unlearned. No other writer had so broken over the barriers of language and race and nationality and philosophy and religion as that most nearly universal of all the sons of men.

GERMANY AND SHAKESPEARE.

The German Shakespeare Society has just celebrated its fiftieth birthday, and there have been many striking interchanges of international goodwill at Weimar, where a brilliant array of professors, men of letters, critics, officials, and representatives of the great theatres recently gathered to celebrate the occasion. King George has been elected a member of the Society, and the veteran actor, Herr von Possart, has been selected as a delegate to the International Committee in London in reply to the invitation from Lord Bryce. Professor Alexander, of Budapest, rather surprised his hearers by stating that, apart from England and Germany, Hungary was the greatest Shakespeare country in the world. He presented a new Hungarian translation of Shakespeare in three volumes.

THE NATIONAL FOOD REFORM ASSOCIATION.

The committee of the National Food Reform Association has passed a resolution expressing their deep regret at the death of Mr. Rollo Russell, one of their original members, and an earnest and generous supporter of the educational and preventive work of the Association, which made strong appeal to him as a tireless worker for the nation's well-being in many of its aspects, and tendering to Mrs. Rollo Russell, Lady Agatha Russell, and the other members of the family their sincere sympathy in their great sorrow.

RARE ELIZABETHAN BOOKS.

Visitors to the Reading Room of the London Library will now be able to profit by the exhibition of some rare books, chiefly of the Elizabethan period, which have been lent by Dr. E. M. Cox. These include Warner's "Albions England," 1586, the first edition; the only known perfect copy of the 1596 edition of Æsop's "Fables" in English; T. Cutwode's "Caltha Poetarum, or the Bumble Bee," 1599; a poem which Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, ordered to be burnt with Marston's "Pygmalion," and Marlowe's Ovid's "Epistles"; and a perfect and extremely scarce example of the first issue of the first edition of Bodenham's "Belvedere or the Garden of the Muses," 1600, an important Elizabethan anthology, which mentions in a prose address to the reader, among the "modern and extant poets," Shakespeare, Marlowe, and Jonson.

PROBLEM No. 55.

By OTTO WURZBURG (Grand Rapids).
First Prize in the great American tourney in memory of Sam Loyd.

BLACK. (3 men.)

WHITE. (4 men.)

White to play and mate in three moves.

SOLUTION OF No. 53.

1. B. B1 (key-move).

Correct solutions have been received from E. Wright, J. W. (Belfast), Dr. Higginson, W. Williams (No. 51A—try 2. K. Kt6), R. B. D. (Edinburgh), A. S. Rodgers, D. Amos, E. C. (Highbury), W. T. M. (Sunderland), O. Lupton, Geo. Ingledew, Rev. B. C. Constable, Rev. I. Wrigley, A. Mielziner (and No. 52), W. E. Arkell, F. S. M. (Mayfield). Of No. 51 and 51A from Chas. Willing (U.S.A.).

The Pittsburg Gazette Times of April 12 devotes two whole newspaper sheets to the publication of the result of the "Sam Loyd" Memorial Tourney, which was a gigantic affair, such was the admiration of the problem world for the late master. The entries were not tied as to length, and the judgment was based, not so much on individual taste, but on what Loyd himself would have considered fine. There were over 250 entries of an international character, and it is curious that our No. 55, so small and apparently simple, should secure premier honours in such a mammoth competition. Mr. Wurzburg is a well-known composer, and a nephew of W. A. Shinkman, the latter being a rival to Loyd himself in fecundity of ideas. Many composers of well-known strength are, however, absent from the list of competitors, due, doubtless, to the fact that the conditions were a little vague. It is hard to weigh the merits of two, three, four, and five-movers. The judges, Messrs. Alain C. White and Murray Marble, have made a most painstaking award in what must be an almost record tourney. The other winners are:—Second, Nicolo Belli (Italy); third, A. W. Daniel (London); fourth, Fr. Sackmann (Germany); fifth, W. A. Shinkman (Grand Rapids); and Otto Wurzburg takes sixth place. The prize fund amounted to about $60.

NEW BOOK by JOHN DENDY,
Author of Successful Life: A Series of Essays.

THE LARGER LIFE.

*A Way through Experience
towards the Truth.*

Crown 8vo. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net, postage 4d.

This book is not intended to be a religious text book nor to advocate any particular form of religious belief. It is concerned with certain great questions which lie behind all forms of religion and with which all forms of religion are more or less closely bound up.

It is partly addressed to those who are feeling the pressure of those questions, while at the same time they do not know which way to turn for a chance of escape from their difficulties. More especially the author has hoped that it may be of use in directing the attention of younger people who have not become set in their habits of thought, to a way of looking at life and the world in which they find themselves, which the ordinary school education does not give.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE days which follow the introduction of a new Budget are a severe test of Christian principle in ordinary life. How do we regard it? From what point of view do we approve of its provisions or desire to resist them? There are, of course, many questions of policy and financial prudence to be considered, upon which men who are equally good and unselfish will come to opposite conclusions. But these are not the matters which we have in mind. It is commonly assumed that the great mass of people will resent any increase of taxation, which touches their own pockets, as harsh or unjust, no matter what the public service may be for which the money is required. Can Christian people, who believe in human brotherhood, act in this way when they have to give more out of their riches or their fairly comfortable means to vast schemes of public utility? It is the poor man whom we have to consider first of all, in his inability to educate his children or to provide delicate nurture for his wife in sickness or to secure even the humblest decencies of life for his own old age. So far as our money is required for these purposes or for the furtherance of a richer and nobler communal life, we ought to give it gladly, and to modify our own scheme of living without unworthy grumbling in any way that may be necessary for the common good.

* * *

LAST week the clergy who have been clamouring for a Declaration of the Bishops against unorthodoxy had their way, and the Convocation of Canterbury by 24 votes to three placed its solemn ban upon liberal opinions. Perhaps some of the petitioners got more than they really wanted, for the statement is so stringent and so comprehensive as to place episcopal censure upon even the most timid forms of modernism. It is laid down “that the denial of any of the historical facts stated in the Creeds goes beyond the limits of legitimate interpretation, and gravely imperils that sincerity of profession which is plainly incumbent on the ministers of Word and Sacrament.” This does not necessarily cover belief in “the resurrection of the flesh,” for that still lies in the future, but it excludes anything except a quite literal acceptance of the descent into hell and the ascension into heaven—it cannot be pleaded that these clauses in the Creed were not intended originally to be historical statements—and accordingly the sincerity of the Bishop of Oxford is attacked quite as severely as that of any group of liberal theologians. Such is the inevitable nemesis of official Declarations!

IN summing up the discussion the Archbishop of Canterbury paid the tribute of many fine words to liberty. The bishops, he affirmed, did not say to honest students and seekers of truth, “Stop, that part is barred.” He would say to every honest student, “Follow truth; do your utmost to find out. Let it be your guide, wherever it may lead you.” Such study, fearless and free, was the strength of the Church’s progress. Such study must not be hindered by a single thought of the consequences of what the conclusions might be. He found it hard to conceive any case in which he should refuse communion to an honest student as such, who called himself a Christian, whatever he thought about the opinions which he had formed. The Church of England had stood for many centuries for comprehension and liberty, and men had braved the fires of Smithfield in the face of an authority which bade them make their reason blind and simply to obey. The Reformation, with its fresh air, its sunshine, and freedom, did not count for nothing in the history of the Church, and they should beware lest they seemed to be stopping freedom and inquiry of thought.

BUT in the end, with the enigmatic sentence that everyone must admit that there must be a limit somewhere, the Archbishop came down on the side of a policy which drives a line of cleavage between enlightened theological inquiry and the working church, and threatens either to curb or to alienate some of the best scholars in the country. We think it is time that there was some very plain speaking about the insincerity of this lip service to freedom, when all the time every conclusion except one is really barred. We have a greater respect for the consistent obscurantist, who says roundly that he does not believe in freedom of thought and inquiry where matters of theology are concerned upon any terms whatever, because the Creeds are the final and infallible word of God. Ultimately it must come to that. Either the Creeds are divine documents or they are the best thought of their day subject to change and revision. This is the issue which the liberal clergy must now force to the front. If the living thought of men cannot be poured into the venerable clauses of the creed, it is the creed itself which must be altered. No document out of the past, however deep the affection which it inspires, can be allowed to bar the way to the advance of knowledge or to assume the position of the final arbiter of truth.

THE death of the Rev. Silvester Horne is a very serious loss to the Free Churches and to many causes of progress and reform. Though he was not the founder of the institutional church it won in his hands a new dignity and power of appeal, and "Whitfield's" has become the pattern for many similar enterprises elsewhere. In religion he was a liberal through his wide social sympathies rather than on the side of thought, for he seems never to have wandered far from the moderate evangelicalism, in which many men at the present day find a harbour of refuge in the conflict between tradition and the insistent claims of the modern world. His early death was probably hastened by the strain which he put upon his physical powers, when he decided to combine the duties of the active ministry with a seat in Parliament. We doubt whether any parliamentary success, realised or prospective, could justify the sacrifice. The strong man who scatters himself too widely and refuses to observe the law of limitation is defeated in the end. Many people deprecated this attempt to live two lives at once when it was made, and the fatal result is the sad justification of their fears. Here, and here only, others may be warned not to follow Mr. Horne's too strenuous example.

SOME interesting light was thrown upon the success of the Borstal treatment of young offenders at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Mr. McKenna's Criminal Justice Administration Bill on Tuesday. Mr. McKenna, giving the most recent figures of male inmates at Borstal institutions, stated that out of the 411, satisfactory accounts had been received in 304 cases. In 34 cases there had been no recent reports, but the cases were satisfactory when last heard of, and there had been no re-convictions. Those figures of 304 and 34 represented 82 per cent. of the whole. Unsatisfactory cases amounted to 73, of which 48 had not been re-convicted, and the re-convicted cases number 25. Those results, he held, were most remarkable, and it was quite as much in accordance with justice to help the prisoner and to restore him to the ordinary conditions of civil life as it was to give him a month's imprisonment with hard labour.

ON the other hand, the Home Secretary was unable to adopt such an optimistic tone in regard to female offenders, in spite of the emphatic statement of the Prison Commissioners, "We see no reason why the Borstal system should not be as effective in the reform of the female criminal as it has been found in the case of the male." The difficulty of dealing with women in the Borstal institutions, he pointed out, was very much greater than it was in the case of men, owing to the character of the offences of young women. When young women had natural weakness of moral character they were much more difficult to keep straight after discharge. Moreover, there was not the same variety of trades which they could be taught. With more experience he hoped they would be able to get better results.

* * *

A SPECIAL thanksgiving service for the blessings of sight will be held to-morrow (Sunday) in a large number of places of worship, as part of the movement by the National Institute for the Blind for the amelioration of the lot of those who cannot see. From replies which have been received to letters sent out by Mr. C. Arthur Pearson, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, Cardinal Bourne, the Chief Rabbi, the secretary of the Brotherhood Movement, and Mr. Bramwell Booth, it is estimated that the simultaneous service will be held at 12,000 churches of the Church of England, 15,000 Nonconformist places of worship, 3,000 Roman Catholic Churches, 3,000 Brotherhood meeting places, the citadels and many of the open-air meetings of the Salvation Army, and the churches of the Greek Church. It is announced that an international conference on the blind, together with an exhibition, will be held at the Church House, Westminster, from June 18 to 24 inclusive, and on the evening of June 17 there will be a special service for delegates at St. John the Evangelist's, conducted by blind clergy, organist, and choir. Special services will again be conducted on the following Sunday, June 21, including the morning and evening services at Westminster Abbey.

"SPIRITUAL HEALING."

THE Report of a Clerical and Medical Committee of Inquiry into Spiritual, Faith, and Mental Healing has been issued this week,* and at once received widespread attention in the newspapers. The Committee is composed of a group of well-known Anglican clergy, including the Deans of WESTMINSTER, St. PAUL's, and DURHAM, the Bishop of STEPNEY, and Professor NEWSOM, and several doctors of eminence. Their united judgment upon the matters submitted to them is not of course decisive, but it will undoubtedly carry weight, and its calm and even tone, free from every trace of exaggeration and sentimentality, ought to be highly beneficial. It may be described as a cold douche of common sense where common sense is greatly needed.

At the outset the Committee express their conviction that the Divine Power is exercised in conformity with and through the operation of natural laws, and commit themselves to the following statement, which all religious people would probably accept: "They consider that spiritual ministration should be recognised equally with medical ministration as carrying God's blessing to the sick, and as His duly appointed means for the furtherance of their highest interests. Too often it has been forgotten that health, bodily and mental, is capable of being influenced for good by spiritual means." In a subsequent paragraph they recognise "That persons suffering from organic disease are greatly comforted and relieved, and even physically benefited, by spiritual ministrations. Such ministrations by appealing to the spiritual nature, and reinforcing the spiritual powers, may contribute greatly to the success of the physical treatment by the medical practitioner."

But the most important conclusions deal with the claims, which are advanced in some quarters, to the possession of special charismatic gifts or miraculous healing powers.

The Committee are of opinion that the physical results of what is called "Faith" or "Spiritual" healing do not prove on investigation to be different from those of Mental healing or healing by "Suggestion." The term Suggestion is used in this Report in a wide sense, as meaning the application of any natural mental process to the purposes of treatment. They recognise that Suggestion is more effectively exercised by some persons than by others, and this fact seems to explain the "gifts" of a special character claimed by various "Healers." It is undoubtedly due to the striking benefits which sometimes result from Suggestion that the belief in such claims has been fostered.

In regard to the plea that other than what are known as "functional" disorders can be dealt with effectively by suggestion the opinion of the Committee is strongly in the negative, and stories of "miraculous cures" of this kind are dismissed as lacking evidence.

They are aware that no sharply defined fundamental distinction can be drawn between "organic" and "functional" ailments. They are forced, however, to the conclusion, after the most careful inquiry, that "Faith" or "Spiritual" healing, like all treatment by suggestion, can be expected to be permanently effective only in cases of what are generally termed "functional" disorders. The alleged exceptions are so disputable that they cannot be taken into account. The Committee would emphasise this point, in order to warn those who resort to "Healers" in the hope of receiving a permanent cure that they may thereby be postponing until too late the medical treatment which might serve to arrest organic disease.

The weak side of the Report from the scientific point of view consists in the meagreness of the evidence which is submitted for examination to the reader. On the other hand, the refusal of some of the witnesses to allow statements of cures in cases of blindness or cancer to be properly tested is very significant. For ourselves we are content to accept the findings of the committee as eminently wise and sensible, and to welcome them as a timely contribution to real religion. It is not the people who try to drag the Christian faith back into the atmosphere of miracle and magic who have a robust and inspiring belief in God, but those who find Him everywhere, and seek for the signs of his grace not in the obscure and the irregular but in the normal workings of his Will. Medical science is more wonderful than miraculous cures can ever be, because it covers a wider field of Divine activity and makes much bigger demands upon the noblest qualities of human character.

This Report on Spiritual Healing makes it clear that the claims put forward are very varied, ranging from a reasonable plea for closer attention to the effect of mental conditions upon bodily disease to a revival of arts which can only be described as magical. We cannot dismiss the subject without calling attention to the latter aspect of the question. It is significant that it goes hand in hand with superstitious practices, which batten upon the wealth and the scepticism of a luxurious civilisation. The quack, the charlatan, the astrologer with his feeble and degrading impostures, have all raised their heads boldly in our midst in recent years, just as they did when the Roman Empire was hastening to decay. If some of the clergy are going to use white magic for the healing of disease they encourage other people to use black magic for the telling of fortunes or the blasting of their enemies. The exorcist will drive a brisk trade; the belief in witchcraft and fortune-telling gypsies will again claim its crowd of dupes and victims; all that has been won for religion by the growth of scientific thought and the idealism of modern literature will become as a dream of yesterday; and men, led captive by their own passions and superstitious fears, will lose their power to worship God in spirit and in truth.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT.

SELF-DENIAL AND SELF-REALISATION.

By THE REV. HENRY GOW.

"And he called unto him the multitudes with his disciples and said unto them, If any man would come after me let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whosoever would save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's shall find it."—MARK viii. 34, 35.

THERE is a little touch in this great and well-known saying of Jesus which we find in the report given in St. Mark's Gospel, and which does not occur in the account of the same event in St. Matthew and St. Luke. In St. Mark's Gospel alone you find the words "and he called unto him the multitudes with the disciples, and said unto them." St. Mark makes it clear, and lays stress upon the fact that these words of Jesus were not spoken merely to the disciples. The teaching was not intended only for men who had separated themselves from the world, and who had dedicated themselves to a special mode of life. Jesus called the multitudes unto him, and it was to them, as well as to the disciples, that he said: "If any man would come after me let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. He that would save his life shall lose it, and he that shall lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's shall find it."

There is no sufficient reason to suppose that the form of this saying has been affected and altered by the event of Christ's death, and that Jesus himself was unlikely to have referred to taking up a cross as the symbol of patient endurance. I do not, indeed, know that any scholar has found an example of this phrase in the Jewish literature of the time, but there is nothing in itself impossible, or even improbable, in Jesus having used it. He was conscious of the danger which threatened him. He must have known, without any miraculous foreknowledge, that crucifixion was a possible or even probable result of his work and teachings. The cross was a common form of punishment, and the man who was condemned to suffer had first to carry his cross to the place of execution. To carry a cross is not merely to carry a heavy burden: it is to carry a burden which will itself become an instrument of still greater suffering. It does not symbolise simply endurance of a heavy load: it symbolises carrying trustfully something which may become a means of yet greater loss and sorrow. It is curious that in the case of Jesus we are told by St. Mark that he did not himself carry his cross, but that one Simon of Cyrene who was passing by was compelled to carry it. It suggests that Jesus was of slight and delicate physique, incapable of carrying so heavy a burden. I do not think, then, that we need regard this great saying as altered in form by a later time under the influence of the death of Jesus on the cross. There are some critics and scholars who think so, but most students of the Gospels regard these words as entirely authentic, and there seems no sufficient reason for doubting the genuineness not only of the thought—which is indisputable—but of the form in which the thought has been expressed.

In speaking to-day especially to the young people to be confirmed, I want to consider the meaning of self-denial, taking up the cross and following Jesus.

Self-denial is an idea which to many modern minds seems absurd or wrong. No word of Jesus is challenged so often or so angrily as this. What we need, it is said, is self-realisation. Thwarted and hindered, and limited in many ways, of course we must all be, by circumstances, and by moral principles. We cannot do always exactly what we like. We find ourselves repressed, cribbed, cabined and confined in all sorts of ways. No man is, or ever can be, absolutely free. He must have some respect for the wishes and the powers of others; he must be affected by the society in which he lives; he must earn his living and deny himself pleasant things which would interfere with his work or his social relationships. No man can escape entirely from the power of circumstances; no man can live entirely as the impulse of the moment suggests. Those who try to live in such a way awake to find themselves more completely slaves than those who recognise the limitations of life. They confess with bitter surprise:

So free we seemed, so fettered fast we are.

But still there goes up the cry for self-realisation, self-expression, self-development. Much of the best and most living modern literature and thought dwells upon this note. And there need not be anything in this cry for self-realisation which is in the least incompatible with the Christian doctrine of self-denial. Christian teachers would make a great mistake in treating the cry for self-realisation as something opposed to Christianity, something to be condemned unheard, something which is shameful and unworthy of human nature. The men and women who long for self-realisation know very well that they are not desiring anything of which they need to be ashamed. They feel a strong and noble impulsion to live a larger, more beautiful, and more joyous life. It is for Christianity to show that the modern cry for realisation—at its best—is really one with the doctrine of self-denial, of carrying our cross, of following Christ. It is one with the great principle: "He that would save his life shall lose it, and he that would lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's shall find it."

Preached in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, on Sunday, May 3, 1914, when several young people were welcomed into the fellowship of the Church.

We are all conscious of latent powers which have never found expression. We have ideals of friendship, of usefulness, of enjoyment, of knowledge, of varied activity which have never been realised. We have dim and unsatisfied yearnings for a beautiful and thrilling life. We are vaguely conscious that we are greater than we know and greater than anyone else knows. It is not conceit but an underlying, often hardly realised faith, that there is something in us more worthy, more heroic, more capable of love and devotion than has ever come to the surface and found expression in our common daily life. It is a feeling of the infinite nature of the soul, its boundless possibilities. We have gifts which have never found employment, we have capacities which have never been exercised. We are living such repressed and narrow lives. We are just concerned with daily bread and with the drudgery of life, and within us there is an immortal soul, capable of something infinite and feeling itself in chains. The springtime beauty and thrill often makes us feel this longing for a freer, larger life in a very poignant way. Those are not the most Christian men and women who try to forget that angel in the house of life, who are entirely content with the littleness and repression of their existence, and who allow "custom to lie upon them with a weight—

Heavy as frost and deep almost as life."

Wordsworth describes the frequent loss of such immortal longings and of free and careless happiness in his great ode on Immortality:—

Shades of the prison house begin to close

Upon the growing boy,
But he beholds the light and whence it flows,

He sees it in his joy.

The youth who daily farther from the east

Must travel, still is nature's priest,

And by the vision splendid

Is on his way attended;

At length the man perceives it die away

And fade into the light of common day.

He tells us how this earth, "the homely nurse

Doth all she can

To make her foster child, her innate man

Forget the glories he hath known

And that imperial palace whence he came."

That poem of Wordsworth is a great and beautiful expression of a certain mood in which, when we are middle-aged, we mourn over our limitations and our dullness, and feel the "heavy, weary weight of all this unintelligible world"; but it is not a description of what need happen or ought to happen to us all as life goes on. It is true that youth is "by the vision splendid upon the way attended," but it is not true that at length all men must "perceive it die away, and fade into the light of common day." Life need not be hardening disillusion, a dull acceptance of the dreary commonplace, a drab uninteresting submission to heavy meaningless fetters as we advance in years. It is against this belief that we are the slaves of law and circumstance, that disappointment and thwartings and narrowness are the natural doom of life, to be accepted with pensive resignation, that the Gospel of self-realisation protests. The Gospel of Christianity protests against it too, with a more fervent faith and with more sustained energy.

The ultimate ideal of Christianity is Life, ever fuller life—eternal life. It does not make for repression or negation. It makes for life and love in their most perfect and completest form. The Gospel of Jesus is essentially affirmative; it is the way to fuller life. He came not to destroy but to fulfil. He said these words to the Pharisees of old who held too narrow a view of law. I believe he would say the same words to modern enthusiasts for the divine right of passion. To know the joy of pure and perfect love, to have the serene vitality which comes to a passionate nature held in strong control, to feel the thrill in nature and in art, to find in common little things their underlying grandeur and significance, to be bounded in a nutshell and yet able to count ourselves kings of infinite space, to perceive the appeal and the call of everything we meet, realising our inward unity with all things in the world, this is the desire of all noble hearts, these are the dim yearnings of the soul; and the way of attainment to such a life is through denying ourselves, bearing our cross bravely and following Christ. To follow Christ is to realise ourselves. His life was perfect self-expression. It was a life of many limitations, full of many disappointments, thwarted, hindered, heavy laden. He could not do the thing that he would. His great hopes for men were unrealised, his aims were misunderstood, his love was flouted, his words seemed to fall like seed by the wayside or among thorns. This wisest of teachers, this noblest of men, spent his life among ignorant Galilean peasants and fishermen until he went up to Jerusalem and gave himself into the hands of his enemies. What life could seem more wasted, more frittered away in uncongenial surroundings, and in unavailing, heart-breaking efforts to achieve the impossible! How small a sphere he occupied! How entirely he seemed to be outside the great political and social movements of his time! And yet we feel in him, dying as he did in early manhood, the completest self-realisation. His love, his thought, his energy were not wasted or spilt like water on the ground. He made himself felt beyond his highest dreams. He realised his vision; he found eternal peace and joy amid the disappointments of his life. He died to live, giving himself gladly to lowly service, rejoicing with full heart in the goodness and beauty of life, following daily the guidance of his Father and his God. There was no bitterness, no complaint, no fretfulness in his life. He found in the circumstances and among the commonplace men and women with whom he lived the means for fullest self-realisation. He carried a cross which led through pain and death to Immortality. We all may do the same. Fullness of life does not depend on high place and wealth, and honour and ease and congenial friends. It is a deeper, fuller life for which we all are longing, and that life depends on obedience to the highest, on faithful persistence in well-doing, on courageous thought and effort in following after the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Self-denial is not the giving up of a present good on behalf of something better in the future. It is the affirmation of our best self at the moment. It is not a prudent calculation, but a glad obedience to the will of God. It is the fulfilment of the highest longings of the soul.

You young men and women would give yourselves to-day to the great quest of life. You would dedicate yourselves to the service of God. You believe, do you not, that life as God has meant our life to be, is good and great beyond your highest imaginings, and you would strive humbly and earnestly to make your lives what God would have them be. You want to feel the responsibility of life, to realise that you must not drift where circumstances would lead you, but that you have a God-given power of choosing right or choosing wrong. You want to think for yourselves, to act for yourselves under the guiding hand of God. You want to feel the awful, and at the same time the splendid and invigorating responsibility of life. You come to say "I will" to the great ideals of love and service.

It lies with you, not with your parents, or your friends, or your circumstances—it lies with you to make your life beautiful and good and noble. No outward events can conquer you. There are hindrances and limitations and disappointments for all of you. There must be many of them. They are part of the divine discipline of life, to be welcomed and not to be feared. They are a means to fuller life.

You thank God to-day, as you remember all the help you have received from parents and friends, and from the peaceful, happy influence of home. You think of all the love which has been given you, all the sacrifices which have been made so gladly for you, all the tender, anxious thought and affection which have been lavished on you. When we are young we take these things sometimes so lightly, and so much as a matter of course. Remember them to-day with deep gratitude. Thank God for the love and devotion of your parents and your friends. There are those who care for you more than they care for life, who would die for you, who would gladly make any sacrifice, however painful, in order that your lives may be bright and good, and full of beauty and strength.

But they cannot do it, for all their love and longing. It lies with you, with the help of God, to make your life good and beautiful, and ever more full of energy and strength. That is what this dedication service means.

You thank God for all the helps, all the love which is yours, and you thank Him, too, that you are independent living souls, made for responsibility, called to think and act for yourselves. It lies with you what you will make of your lives. No one else, however near and dear, can make them for you. You can realise yourselves beyond even your highest dreams. You can go on from strength to strength.

Life lies before you now in all its radiant mystery. It has in it for you many sorrows and temptations. You will have God's help with you through them all. In meeting them bravely you will find more serenity and strength. Life has in it also wonderful experience of joy and beauty and love, and splendid thoughts and high visions and communion with the living God. We pray God for you that He may give you the desires of your heart, that you may fight the good fight and keep the faith, that you may deny yourselves and take up your cross and follow Christ.

I welcome you to-day into the Communion of the Christian Church.

"Be strong and of good courage; be not affrighted nor be thou dismayed, for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest."

THE ERASMUS OF INDIA.

So little, we fear, is generally known of the once famous Rajah Rammohun Roy, that comparatively few readers will be able at once to appraise the significance of the title quoted above. It was bestowed upon him by the biographer of Alexander Duff, one of India's best missionary friends. A volume which has been recently edited and published by our friend, Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar, M.A., may help to make its application clear, while it also reveals the gap that, after all, lies between the Dutchman of the sixteenth century and the Hindu of the nineteenth.

The book is entitled "Life and Letters of Raja Rammohun Roy." It is issued at the "B. M. Press," 211, Cornwallis-street, Calcutta (price rs. 2-8); and its typographical defects are such as unfortunately mark most Indian publications known to the present writer. Moreover, the matter of the book has a somewhat complicated history. Originating in the zealous devotion during twelve long years of Miss Sophia Dobson Collet, who rendered invaluable service to the history of Indian theism last century, the "Life" was left unfinished at her death in 1894. An able anonymous "Continuator," at her urgent desire, proceeded with the work, and brought it to completion six years later, when it was published privately. In issuing a second edition, Mr. Sarkar has embraced the opportunity of adding a biographical sketch of Miss Collet, and an "Introduction," as well as a considerable appendix, his endeavour being "to make the present volume a complete up-to-date collection of all available information about the Father of modern India." When it is added that copious footnotes by the various writers supplement and correct the text, and at times each other, enough is said to illustrate the nature of the book.

Some day, perhaps, when India has blossomed into her great future, some Jortin or Froude of the East will do justice to the romance as well as the historical importance of Rammohun Roy's career. Just a hundred years ago he took up residence in Calcutta, being then a man of forty-two years, with a record of much study, keen debate, and earnest effort behind him. From 1814 to 1830 he led the way in literary, political, social, and religious reforms. In the latter year he voyaged (round the Cape, of course) to England, being the first Brahmin to cross the great seas. His remaining three years were spent chiefly in this country, where he was a living argument against the stupidity—even now not quite outgrown in certain circles—of regarding the Indian merely as a "nigger." Physically and mentally, he was a fine man. His goodly presence and charming manners quite captivated polite society in London. His linguistic attainments covered Bengali, Persian, Arabic, Greek, Hebrew, English. In our own tongue—which he had to learn comparatively late—he acquired singular literary force and clearness. As a student of the ancient Vedantic scriptures he can have had few equals; but the Koran and the Bible were also familiar to him, and he could often out-distance Mussulman and Christian in knowledge of their respective scriptures. In the sphere of education, he cast the whole weight of his influence on the side of the "Anglicists," as against the "Orientalists," and thus gave enormous impetus to the movement that has brought Western literature and science so intimately home to his countrymen. Of his services to social reform, it is enough to select for mention his share in the abolition of the practice of suttee—the self-immolation of Indian widows on their husbands' funeral pyres; it was a reform illustrating the passion with which he sought the elevation of women in all their relationships.

That there was a religious aspect to the question of suttee is obvious; and the way in which he treated it is characteristic of the Erasmian tactics he sometimes adopted. Instead of appealing to the first principles of our common humanity, he utilised his profound learning in the ancient scriptures of his race. By many a text he proved that the supposed sacred necessity of the rite was illusory, and that the spirit of the older authorities was against it. Heroic he could be upon occasion, and he delivered "frontal attacks" when required; but his capacity for artful strategy was no less real. As a founder of Indian journalism he evidently had little to learn in the dubious methods of pseudonymous debate. Some critics dealt hard measure to him when they seemed to detect diplomacy, not to say duplicity, in his dealings with Christians generally, and the different sects in particular. Was he really ever a good Presbyterian, or a sound Anglican? Despite his very close intimacy and co-operation with Unitarians, was he truly one of them? Was he, indeed, a Christian at all? To us, observing at this distance the man's development, and influenced by the changed estimates now obtaining in such things, any question of the kind is hardly worth discussion. But things were different eighty or a hundred years ago, when the necessity of a dogmatic stamp was unquestioned, and partisanship was an indispensable mark of sincerity. Bishop Middleton, the predecessor of Heber at Calcutta, is credited with having painted in glowing colours the future fame Rammohun Roy would attain if he would decisively take the lead in converting India to Christianity, himself a convert. The proposal, it is said, revolted the Brahmin's mind, as a kind of parallel to the devil's offer to Jesus of all the kingdoms of the world! Clearly, whatever sympathies bore him this way or that as he came into touch with different types of religious thought, the main current of his life is quite truly indicated by that "new Church of India," the Brahmo Samaj, which he founded shortly before leaving home for England. Sympathetic, eclectic, he might well be; but he felt that the religious thoughts and feelings of his race had some vital spring in them after all, which, for his race, would be better than any alien type, however splendid and life-giving in other lands. Who shall say that he was wrong, or that the Indian theism which he sought to recover in its purity, and which, through good and ill fortune, has mingled its influences not unworthily among those that have given new birth to the Indian people, is not capable of immensely greater achievements in the future? Let those who doubt recall what it has already done in the lives of scholars, scientists, administrators, sages, philosophers, and poets—or rather, for most of us have but too little that we can recall on the subject, let us take the assurance that such men are there, and have been. Take one single family: Dwarkanath Tagore, twenty years the junior of the Rajah, and his "right hand" in munificent works of public utility as well as his co-adjutor in founding the Brahmo Samaj, was the father of Debendranath Tagore, called the "Great Rishi," one of the most saintly of men and the teacher of many, including the celebrated Keshub Chunder Sen. Of his sons, the grandsons of Dwarkanath, India knows several who have attained eminence in philosophy and civic life; the whole reading world knows one—Rabindranath Tagore. The tree that bears such fruit was surely worth planting.

WASTE PLACES.

"I love all waste and solitary places."—SHELLEY.

OUR cities grow and grow, and the fields retreat before their advance, until there is no space for green trees and grass, no view of the sunset, no horizon—nothing but the hard pavements, red walls, and red or blue roofs. One by one the country roads are invaded by the speculative builder, until there seems no way of escape, and the face of the land is changed. Not long ago there was a road leading down to a farm, and in summer it was a leafy avenue with fairy-like wild parsley growing in the hedges, and flat white discs of elder-blossom. (Oh, strange pungent smell of happy memory!) In the early spring there were even pens of sheep and lambs in the fields beside the road. Now all these sweet things are gone, and there are trim suburban residences with well-kept gardens in their place.

Between these two stages there is generally an interval—the phase of the “desirable building site,” while the ground lies waste, open to the passer-by, and a happy hunting-ground for children and pet dogs. I know a rough field that is passing through this stage, doomed, but waiting awhile, though already loads of builders’ rubbish have been dumped promiscuously by the side of the new road across it. In winter-time this is a dull spot—wild and gloomy, for on one side the ground slopes down to a canal, and on another there is a great brickfield, with a clay pit like a slate quarry or an amphitheatre. There are hedges between, with a few trees and a broken gate—and that is the gate of vision in this little wilderness, for through that gap there is a view of the sunset behind the hills far away on the other side of the canal and the meadows.

When the early spring comes, tender green things appear everywhere, clothing the hillocks of rubbish with strange little stunted plants that

Cast on stubborn soil, put forth changed buds

And softer stains unknown in happier climes.

Sometimes there are strayed revellers from the villa gardens—the cool grey-green leaves of Shirley poppies, whose showy purple and white blooms seem almost exotic amongst the thistles and docks; or pale evening primroses, opening slowly and mysteriously at sunset and scenting the air with a subtle sweetness. This is a place for twilight pilgrimages, when it is silent and deserted, and the glamour of the afterglow gives its wild and rough picturesqueness a weird and even solemn aspect.

Of course, it has a commonplace new name, this pleasant wilderness, but in those days before the builders’ invasion it was Barbizon, because of some fancied resemblance to the landscapes of Millet’s pictures, and partly because the brickfield and the brick-makers who sometimes came through the broken gate between the willow and the elder bushes were suggestive of his French peasants, their toil and their closeness to the earth. More than all, perhaps, it was the silence and the twilight that recalled the “Angelus,” and the “Shepherdess.” Certainly there were no sheep there, but it would scarcely have seemed surprising to have heard the sound of their bells and their bleating, and to have met the pathetically beautiful figure of the little shepherdess, intent on her knitting and oblivious of the glory of the crimson sunset.

Another scene of Barbizon life lies about a quarter of a mile away, and this is the field where the sower throws his grain crosswise in the air, while the ploughman and his horses are making the ground ready for him in the distance. This same place, late in summer, was the golden harvest field of the Gleaners, though there was only a modern reaping-machine, and no grand stooping figures in the foreground, with their reminiscence of antique statuary.

This field belongs to Millet’s Barbizon, but on the other side of the road is a scene from New England. There is an old, deserted farmhouse, very straight and ugly and brown, but with a curious likeness to Hawthorne’s Old Manse in Concord. Beyond the house is an orchard, and then a large field, golden with buttercups in June. There are great elm trees beside it, and, therefore, this is sometimes the road near Coate farm, and one tree may be that beneath which Richard Jefferies experienced raptures of communion with the spirit of Nature. Beyond this field the river flows, and there Shelley and the poets may be remembered; but these are not “waste places,” for they belong to the true country-side.

Such are the fancies that may help to make a delight of the monotonous duty-walks of those whose physical limitations cannot altogether subdue the happy restlessness of the spirit. No foreign travel, few changes of scene, and none of the joys of adventure and discovery are possible to many an eager soul. Yet imagination, the magician, can transform the prose of waste places into romance and poetry. It is not merely the child’s gift of vision that sees in the nursery hearth-rug a desert island amid faery seas forlorn. All nature is one, fields are fields in any land, and trees and flowers and streams and rivers are always mysteries and symbols, revealing the spirit of Nature, had we but eyes to discern it. And so the wise mystic, Emerson, wrote “The moral sensibility which makes Edens and Tempes may not always be found, but the material landscape is never far off. We can find these enchantments without visiting the Como Lake or the Madeira Islands. We exaggerate the praises of local scenery. In every landscape the point of astonishment is the meeting of the sky and the earth, and that is seen from the first hillock as well as from the top of the Alleghanies. The stars at night stoop down over the brownest, homeliest common, with all the spiritual magnificence which they shed on the Campagna, or on the marble deserts of Egypt.”

AN interesting little ceremony was held at the Gresham Press last week, when Mr. G. Sweet was presented by his friends and fellow-workers with a tangible expression of their esteem on the eve of his departure to Canada. Mr. Sweet has worked on THE INQUIRER in the noble art of printing for more than fifty years, and we venture to congratulate him upon a long life of useful labour, and to express to him our gratitude and good wishes upon his retirement.

MEMORIAL TO MISS OCTAVIA HILL.

SIR,—There recently passed away from us three saint-like and heroic people who may be said in their various ways to have inspired the nation’s life by their ideal of love and service—Florence Nightingale, Canon Barnett, and Octavia Hill. We of the National Trust are specially concerned with the latter whose creed, whether in the matter of the housing problem or of the obtaining of open spaces and recreation grounds for the people, lay deep-bedded on the rock of her conviction that God has always been pleased to build his best bridges with human piers not angels, and that He has always let us help Him if we will. It has been well said of her that “she was a free saint,” and her humility grew like the lilies of the field. Those of us who were privileged to be her co-workers believe that we shall be serving the nation well and truly by seeing that some permanent memorial of her abundant lovingkindness for the people shall be preserved for future generations.

An opportunity, not to be lost, has occurred of obtaining one of the magnificent vantage grounds for rest and beauty in the wooded height of Hydon Ball, three miles from Godalming, in Surrey. This wooded hill of 92 acres can be obtained for £5,500, and towards this £2,000 have already been raised. Is it asking too much of the Great Britain that Miss Hill loved and served with a heart so tender to the last to all natural beauty, that an effort should be made, not only by Surrey folk, not only by the London for which she cared and toiled, but also by Lancashire in whose cities work inspired by her still goes forward, and by the English Lake District for whose beauty spots she so constantly laboured, to unite in giving the £3,000 still necessary to ensure the completeness of the memorial? The option of purchase remains open to us for a few more months. Cheques should be sent to the Secretary of the National Trust, 25, Victoria-street, London, S.W., and crossed “National Provincial Bank of England.”—Yours, &c.,

PLYMOUTH,

Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Trust.

THE PRIMATE AND FREE CRITICISM.

SIR,—Last week the Archbishop of Canterbury is reported to have offered some remarks on the theological unrest within the Anglican Church, and presented the appearance of giving a cheer to those who desired perfect freedom of inquiry; no path was to be barred, no conclusion was to be forbidden; truth was to be followed wherever it might lead, without a single thought of the consequences; fearless and free study was the strength of the Church's progress. All this seems admirable. But then follow the significant words—"He found it hard to imagine any case in which he would refuse communion to an honest student as such who was otherwise qualified to call himself a Christian, whatever he thought about the opinions the man had formed." Have we not here one of those exquisite casuistries for which churchmanship is famous? It appears to intimate that an honest student may, as a student, arrive at certain opinions which, as a Christian, he may not profess.

Suppose, for example, the honest student reaches the conclusion that the historical reality of Jesus is doubtful, and that in any case a human existence is a too narrow basis on which to build a Church? Suppose that, like Professor Eucken, in his just-translated book, "Can we still be Christians?" he sweeps aside the entire fabric of creedal and miraculous Christianity, including the churches which are its custodians, both Catholic and Protestant, and demands a foundation broader and more human and universal? Suppose he decides against the reality of a supernatural, demi-urgic Christ by whom the worlds are created and man redeemed; reduces Christ, or Jesus, to a symbol of man's ideal nature; and ventures to doubt whether the truthful surrender of the historical and the mythological justifies him in any longer retaining the Christian name? Would the Archbishop comfort such an honest student by administering to him the Communion, and by assuring him that he was "otherwise qualified" to be called a Christian? If so, what might be the nature of those "other" qualifications? If not, have we here, after all, anything more than the familiar stand-patter's attitude—the conclusion is barred, therefore the inquiry is forbidden? I submit, Sir, that in the present state of unrest it is of vital interest to ask and endeavour to answer such questions as these.—Yours, &c.,

Minister of the Theistic Church,

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—It is the intention of the Committee to close the Pritchard Fund at the end of the present month. The object of the Fund, we may remind your readers, is to honour one of the most widely known and respected members of our community. For over twenty years Mr. Pritchard, as hon. secretary of the Sunday School Association, has rendered services of the highest order. In that honorary capacity he devoted the great portion, not merely of his leisure, but the whole day to the work of the Association, and spared himself no labour that the cause he loved might prosper. Owing to the calls on behalf of other funds the Committee have refrained from pressing their appeal unduly upon the generosity of our churches and schools; but they wish to afford this opportunity, before the fund closes, for contributions to the testimonial, which Mr. Pritchard in his turn desires shall be devoted to helping some of the special objects of the Sunday School Association.

Contributions, which will be gratefully acknowledged, should be forwarded to the treasurer, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, jun., Essex Hall, W.C.—Yours, &c.,

THOS. P. SPEDDING, Ex-President.
W. B. ODGERS, JUN., Treasurer.
T. M. CHALMERS, Hon. Secretary.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

CAN WE STILL BE CHRISTIANS?

Can We Still be Christians? By Rudolf Eucken. Translated by Lucy Judge Gibson. London: Adam & Charles Black. 3s. 6d. net.

TRANSLATIONS of Professor Eucken's books still come from the publishers in an almost ceaseless stream, and we cannot help wondering where the people are who absorb books so intensely German in form and outlook without the ability to read them in the original. We noticed this popular brochure, "Können wir noch Christen sein?" when it first appeared. Its importance consists in the definiteness with which it discusses the problem of religious reconstruction in face of the intellectual and social conditions of modern life. For Professor Eucken, traditional theology has disappeared with the cosmology and the categories of thought of the ancient and the mediæval world which it so largely reflects. "The fact," he writes, "that to-day we are not quite so confident of the uniformity of all natural process as we were a little while ago does not lessen our objection to such a violation of nature's order as is implied in miracles." Or again, he speaks with emphasis of the injury which is done to religion by the fact that "in Christian dogmatic teaching, necessary and fundamental truths, on which our whole life depends, are wedded to a specific mode of conceiving them, which we can no longer tolerate." On the other hand, he is quite clear in his acceptance of Transcendence as essential to our idea of the Divine, of the primal inspiration of great personalities, and of the place of the Church in effective religion. "If progressive minds to-day feel the Church to be mainly a weight and a hindrance, the fault lies not in the nature of the Church in general, but in the fact that the churches of the present day do not meet the needs of our present stage of development. But this should urge us to a renewal of the churches, not to a rejection of them." All this prepares the way for his contention that Christianity is a movement rather than a ready-made position, and that within it quickening forces are still slumbering, "forces which have by no means lived themselves out, and are still capable of breaking forth again and driving human life into new channels with an irresistible and elemental violence." Mrs. Boyce Gibson has surmounted many of the difficulties of translation successfully; but she has not been always sufficiently on her guard against the use of ugly composite words like soul-experience, sense-juxtaposition, life-depth, truth-content. We are too jealous for the beauty of the English tongue to allow even the hurried translator to indulge in this art of false coining without protest.

MONSIGNOR VILLAROSA. By the Duke Litta. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

THE clerical novel is rather a sickly plant on English soil. We do not forget Anthony Trollope, who is the great exception, but his stories belong to a restricted Anglican world of their own with an enticing feminine background. They are not in the same category as "L'Abbé Tigrane," which depends for its interest entirely upon the forceful presentation of clerical character. The Duke Litta is not the equal of Ferdinand Fabre in literary gift, but he is familiar with similar types, and the priests which crowd his pages are drawn with satirical vigour, though the shadows are probably deepened by anti-clerical bias. His new story, which is dedicated to the memory of Father Tyrrell, is an episode, fanciful in details though, we fear, real enough in spirit, in the suppression of Modernism in Italy. Monsignor Villarosa is a scholarly bishop of noble family who is suspect at Rome on account of his liberal opinions, but still more because he is an Italian patriot with ardent social sympathies, who in early life had served with Garibaldi in the Sicilian expedition. The love interest is supplied by his nephew, a young officer, from whom the bishop cannot withhold his blessing though he marries a divorcee. Here are ample materials for a story of cabal, intrigue, and delation ending in the downfall of the old man, who is too much of a saint and a gentleman either to smirch his honour or to deny the pure instincts of his own heart. The author writes with a wonderful command of English, which betrays its origin more by its exuberance than by anything definitely foreign in its accent.

NAZARETH AND THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY. By Champlin Burrage, B.Litt. Oxford: the University Press. 3s. 6d. net.

MR. BURRAGE maintains that the Nazarenes and Ebionites have been greatly misunderstood by Christian writers under the influence of Epiphanius and Jerome. He identifies them as the primitive Jewish Christians. The Gospel according to the Hebrews, of which only a few fragments survive, is the "Q" or gospel source of which scholars have long been in search; and the Ebionite Gospel, occasionally cited and mentioned by Epiphanius and others, is the original Mark, of which our second gospel is an amended translation. Our first gospel is "practically a reproduction" of the Hebrews' gospel, with which all the evangelists were acquainted. Primitive Jewish Christians, dissatisfied with the birth story of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which we know in Matthew, compiled the Ebionite Gospel; whilst Gentile Christians, to suit different parties in the Church, wrote our four canonical gospels. The evidence is altogether too slight to bear this imposing structure. Recent criticism has given to the "Hebrews" Gospel a more honourable position than formerly, and the study of Aramaic has lent a fresh interest to Semitic Christians and their scriptures, but the linguistic and analytical investigation of the Synoptics have led far from the conclusions of Mr. Burroughs. The "New View" is interesting as the world may be, seen from the clouds through a mist, but the cautious student will always prefer to keep close to established facts.

It is refreshing to find that Dr. Figgis, amid more absorbing cares and his devotion to the office of malleus hereticorum, has not forgotten his first love for history and political philosophy. He has recently republished his early prize-essay on THE DIVINE RIGHT OF KINGS (Cambridge: at the University Press, 6s. net) with some additional essays, including one on Erastus and Erastianism. He is very candid in the preface about the defects of his work and its need of more thorough revision than he was able to undertake; but the field of research is one in which he has very few competitors, and this volume must be added to the very small group of English books, like his own "From Gerson to Grotius," and Carlyle's "History of Political Theory in the West," which deal with political thought and some of its fundamental conceptions from the historical point of view.

We have received a revised and enlarged edition of THE PROBLEM OF HUMAN LIFE, by Professor Eucken (London: T. Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net). The various additions made to the book since the translation appeared in 1909 have been grouped together in appendices which fill nearly thirty pages at the end of the volume. There is also a new chapter on "The American View of Life," in which Professor Eucken gathers together some of the impressions made upon his own mind by his recent visit. He finds in the inherent religious nature of the American people a ground for sober optimism. "The union of democracy and religion," he writes, "is permanently characteristic of American idealism." We doubt, however, whether dogmatic teaching has given place to interest in ethical and social problems so completely as Professor Eucken imagines. The Puritan strain is still very strong in some sections of American society, and this has resulted in an attitude of dogmatic rigidity in face of the disintegrating influences of modern thought. But the chapter is far too slight for any adequate discussion of the most absorbing problems of American life, like the immigration of the Latin races and their fusion with the older stock to form a new civilisation.

FIVE new volumes of the Home University Library will be published next Tuesday by Messrs. Williams & Norgate, which will bring the list up to ninety volumes. Professor Patrick Geddes and Professor J. Arthur Thomson have collaborated in an illustrated volume on "Sex," Miss Grace Hadow gives an account of the life and work of Chaucer in "Chaucer and his Times," Professor Grenville Cole contributes a volume entitled "The Growth of Europe," Mr. A. Clutton Brock in "William Morris, his Work and Influence," narrates the life of Morris as poet, artist, craftsman, and agitator, giving some estimate of his literary work, and Canon Watson, Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford, has dealt with "The Church of England" from Anglo-Saxon times to the present day.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE PARTHENON AT ATHENS.

III.—TEMPLE DECORATIONS.

In your visits to the British Museum you have probably seen the wonderful marble statues arranged in the Elgin room, and wondered what they all mean, or whether there was any meaning attached to them. Many of them are headless, some without arms, and all more or less mutilated; but what is left of them shows that the men who carved them had great skill in carving the human form. And when you know what they represent, and the position they occupied originally, you will be surprised that the Athenians, who lived in that beautiful city so far back as five hundred years before Christ, had such inspiring thoughts about Wisdom. Everything in the way of decoration in and about this temple had to do with suggestions about Wisdom.

These broken statues were brought to England by Lord Elgin, the British Ambassador to Turkey, in 1780. He found the beautiful works of art being used by Turkish soldiers as targets, and the Greeks themselves were taking the marble to make other buildings. The ancient temple was neglected, and formed a quarry. To save them from entire destruction Lord Elgin shipped them to England, and they were housed in the British Museum, where, at any rate, they will be cared for.

On the walls of the Elgin room you will find a number of panels called Metopes. Originally there were ninety-two of these square carved panels on the outside walls of the Parthenon. Forty-two still remain on the temple, fifteen are in London. They look very strange, and you think that no such creatures as are represented ever existed. Centaurs, with the bodies of animals and heads and arms of men, are shown as struggling with men and gods. Of course, no such combat was ever seen in the flesh; but the Greek artist never imagined that to be the case. He has used these human and animal forms to represent moral and spiritual ideas. Animal tendencies, passions, hatreds, low desires, are symbolised by the bodies of horses. The human mind is indicated by the forms of men, and the Divine forces by the figures of heroic beings. So we see clearly that here on the Temple of Wisdom, the people were taught that a great struggle was taking place in the world. The Divine forces were helping human beings to subdue animal qualities, and the warfare, like all other struggling, had its varying successes and defeats. In proportion to the overcoming of the animal, the human being becomes nobler, and displays some of the Divine qualities of the gods, and thus achieves Wisdom.

On the great pedestals in the centre of the Elgin room are placed the larger figures which have been taken from the Eastern front of the temple. The set of these statues is not complete for the central figures were destroyed long ago. What remains, however, has revealed to scholars a beautifully worked-out parable, suggesting how human beings become wise. The coming of Wisdom was shown in the centre by a carved tableau, representing the birth of the goddess Athena; and the other figures on either side were intended to show the effects of Wisdom upon the mind.

As we all wish to be wise, it will be worth our while to take a little trouble to find out what the ancient Greeks taught about the coming of Wisdom.

Now, if we regard the whole tableau as a parable we shall find it shows a poetic picture of a day; and the day is used as an emblem of a life; and day and life are made to symbolise the coming of wisdom and its effects. In one corner, the south angle, we have Helios, the god of the Sun, rising from the sea in his four-horsed chariot, and in the opposite angle Selene, the moon, in her chariot is disappearing beneath the horizon. Here, then, is the dawn of the day on the one hand, and the sinking of night on the other. Between these two suggestions are to be seen figures representing the growing power of light, and then its gradual declining. We must remember that the light of day is the Greek symbol of Wisdom; and then if we note that light is a blessing felt all over the world, we shall see that the Greeks were trying, by these decorations, to explain how not only in their own locality, but everywhere, all people were to become wise.

Let us try to trace the development. First the sun rises in his chariot of the Dawn. The heads of the horses have just emerged on the crest of the waves which wash the shore. On the shore, seated on his rocky couch, there is a fine figure of a noble man, called by the ancients Theseus. Theseus was the emblem of Divine work among men. He had a great temple all to himself in the plain of Athens, where the business was transacted—for when Wisdom had been received from the Gods it had to be applied to the ordinary affairs of everyday life. Theseus is represented in the Pediment as rising from his reclining position with his head and arms so posed as to show alertness. His eyes are wide open with a look of surprise and wonder, for he has seen the wonderful coming of light, and his whole being is radiant with the thrill of wisdom. Though the figure is so much broken, we can see that the artist finely suggested that this man who had received the light of wisdom himself was ready to communicate it to others. Next to him are two seated figures representing Demeter, the Earth Mother, and Persephone, her daughter, the goddess of flowers. As the sun rises in power the earth is cheered and refreshed; and the flowers, by its influence, are made to bloom, and so give beauty to the otherwise dull earth. As we follow these figures in their procession we must not forget that while they show the influence of the sun upon the earth, they are intended also to indicate the rise of wisdom in the human being. To become truly wise is to have the power of giving cheer and beauty to the earth and our surroundings. This thought is shown not only in the figures of Demeter and Persephone, but in the next to whom Persephone speaks. This figure is shown to be standing, for she is carved almost in the centre of the pediment where there is room for a standing posture. She is thought to be Iris, the genius of colour, and is usually associated with the rainbow, which embraces all beautiful shades, tints, and tones.

After this we have a vacant space where once stood the most important figures of the entire series. Being in the central position it would naturally be concerned with the chief conception of Wisdom in its full power. This central group was appropriately followed by a beautiful form of Victory. It is now much damaged, and we only have the figure from the neck to the knees, but even so, it is a wonderful piece of work, indicating joy in triumph. The nature-thought is the sun at mid-day shining in all its glory and power, suggesting the complete conquest of the human mind in its grappling with difficulties in life and mysteries in nature. As wisdom comes, Victory is assured. From its dawn after the night of darkness it has been giving pleasure and beauty to the earth and man; and now that light falls on the puzzling questions, the joyful and exultant thrills of recognised victory are experienced. It need not be thought that the Greeks considered they had themselves achieved complete victory over ignorance. In these carvings they are indicating how Victory in mental, moral, and spiritual things must come at any time and everywhere. Light from heaven comes upon man and his earthly home, and then he must exert himself to receive it and apply it before he can see the night of ignorance dispelled. He sees its effects on the beauty and fruitfulness of his work, and then he can rejoice that Victory has so far been accomplished.

After Victory, the sculptor Pheidias has placed three reclining figures who look with sadness upon Selene in her moon chariot sinking into the sea. The three figures are known as the Fates, and were intended in earlier days to convey the thought that mankind had no power over his destiny. The heads and arms are missing, so it is difficult to know exactly how they were originally engaged; but the idea has been conveyed to us by ancient writings; and the idea was that now man has attained Victory, if he will use it, he has his fate very much in his own hands. In proportion to the amount of Wisdom that he has received he will be able to govern his own progress in life. The fates are there, but they are seated and seem passive. The heads of two of them are turned to the sinking moon, and therefore may be supposed to be contemplating the decline of power, the close of the day, the coming of death, and the eclipse of mental activity. These are all interwoven in the symbolic carvings. But we have to remember that Victory has been achieved, and the whole series of statues together emphasises the dawn of new power. It is a marvellous tableau of one moment, the moment that sees the night sinking, and the new day dawning. Ignorance departs and wisdom arises.

Next week we shall consider the central idea of the Birth of Wisdom, which will bring all these symbols into one thought.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING AT BELL-STREET.

THE seventy-ninth annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society was held at the Bell-street Mission, Edgware-road, on Wednesday evening, May 6, the Rev. F. K. Freeston in the chair. Mr. Philip Roscoe, treasurer, read the statement of accounts, which showed the necessity for new and increased subscriptions to meet the heavy losses sustained by death and resignation, amounting to £100 in the last two years. The report of the Committee, which was read by the Rev. H. Gow, hon. secretary, made special reference to the late illness of the Rev. F. Summers, the Missioner at Dingley-place, who is now happily restored to health. In bidding farewell to the Rev. R. P. Farley, who is terminating six and a-half years' work at the Bell-street Mission, the Committee desired to express their thanks to him and to Mrs. Farley for all that they had done. Mr. Farley had been a hard worker, and a stimulating teacher, and their cordial good wishes would follow him into his new sphere of work. The Rev. A. Golland, late minister at Ipswich, is taking his place, and the Committee look forward to a closer relationship between the Bell-street Mission and Essex Church, where Mr. Golland was for two years curate under the Rev. F. K. Freeston. Warm thanks were given to the three Missionaries for their devoted work. It was impossible to report on this fully, as the influence of human love and sympathy cannot be tabulated. The death of the following well-known and honoured subscribers was recorded with much regret:—Miss Bridgett, Miss Hodgetts, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. Frank Preston, Mrs. Rutt, and Mr. Sutton Sharpe.

The reports of the Missionaries were taken as read. In moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, Mr. Freeston expressed the regret which was felt at Mr. Farley's departure, and paid a warm tribute to the devotion and self-sacrifice of the men and women who had supported the Society ever since its inception eighty years ago. When he realised how many movements were on foot for doing the kind of work they had been doing, the modest range of their labours and the entire absence of anything like advertisement in order to push its claims, he thought it would be hard to find another society on similar lines which had gone nearer to the realisation of its ideals. They were living in times very different from those in which the Domestic Mission movement was started by Dr. Tuckermann. The air was now full of social questions, the social conscience was awakened, students were carefully collecting facts relating to the conditions of the people, and legislators were taking up the work of social amelioration; but while they valued the knowledge thus obtained, they still wanted men who would make these facts human, and go into the homes of the people as friends and advisers.

An interesting record of what is being done by the School for Mothers, which meets at Rhyl-street two afternoons a week, was given by Mrs. Moon, who, together with Mrs. Dendy and others, is carrying on this work with excellent results. Mrs. Eveleigh moved a resolution reiterating the confidence of the members in the principles of the Society, and expressing both the thanks of the Committee to the missionaries, and their regret that Mr. and Mrs. Farley, and also Miss Anthony, who has done such good work in connection with the Sunday school, are leaving Bell-street. After seventy-nine years' work, she said, they sometimes felt that their principles needed a little restatement, and that new methods were also desirable. They had learnt a great deal in recent years. They knew now that it was not the people who made the conditions in which they lived so much as the conditions that made the people what they were, and consequently they did not go to them quite so much in the manner of teachers, but as brothers and sisters anxious to help them to make things better. The workers to whom they were bidding farewell at that meeting were imbued with these new ideas, and had been trying new methods, and they had all learnt a great deal from Mr. Farley and his wise, open-minded, and kindly way of dealing with the problems that confronted them. They were also indebted to Miss Anthony for bringing, together with much personal devotion and the capacity to win and inspire others, the best modern educational theories and methods to the training of the children. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. H. Gow, who emphasised the definitely religious influence of the Missions. In regard to the work which Mr. and Mrs. Farley had done, it was, he said, a sign of their unflagging energy that the mission work was now at high-water mark, and it was also a sign of the deep and sincere regret that was felt at their leaving that the people had gathered round them so loyally, showing how they appreciated their efforts. Miss Anthony had deeply rooted herself into the hearts and lives, not only of the children, but of the young people, and had effected a reformation in the Sunday school at a time when it was much needed. A presentation of a bag was then made to Miss Anthony on behalf of the Sunday scholars, and Miss Anthony, in replying, urged the young people to carry on the work which they had begun together, and so lay the foundations of a brighter future for their church and Mission. Mr. Morris, of the Charity Organisation Society, and Mr. Dunt, secretary of the Bell-street Congregational Union, also spoke in appreciation of Mr. Farley's work and influence.

Mr. Farley, in replying, said that he was leaving Bell-street for the same reason that had brought him there—to serve the people, about the condition of whose lives he had learnt so much during ten years of strenuous work among them both in the North and in London. In paying a warm tribute to the wonderful loyalty of the members of the Mission, he said it was a remarkable fact that at least 95 per cent. of them were active workers, and all contributed something to the funds. They were, in the words of Robert Louis Stevenson, "steel true and blade straight," and he felt that they would rally round Mr. Golland as warmly as they had rallied round him when they knew him as he did. The Revs. F. Summers and W. H. Rose added a few words, and Mr. Philip Roscoe, in the name of the Committee, extended a warm welcome to the Rev. A. Golland. Mr. Freeston, in seconding, spoke warmly of his own personal friendship for Mr. Golland, and his experience of the sympathy and capacity for understanding which he would bring into his relationship with the people of the Bell-street Mission. The Rev. A. Golland replied in a cordial speech. The election of the officers and committee was then proposed by the Rev. A. Pearson, seconded by Mr. W. S. Tayler, and the meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman proposed by Mr. Philip Roscoe.

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION. PROGRAMME FOR THE SEASON.

THE Rev. T. P. Spedding writes:—

"I shall be obliged if you will kindly allow me to make known through your columns the arrangements for the Van

Mission for the coming season. The Mission opens on Monday week, the 18th inst., and those who have followed our work in former years will see that we are to break a good deal of new ground in the journeys that lie immediately ahead of us. It has been found possible at length to adopt the frequently renewed suggestion that a trial should be made in North Wales. The Liverpool Association will co-operate in this piece of work, and its district minister, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, is taking a keen interest in the arrangements. The South Wales Van, on the other hand, will be saying farewell for a few weeks to the Principality, and will then move for a couple of months amid new scenes, just skirting the Western district which has wanted an experience of the Mission, but hitherto in vain. No. 2 Van is bound for the South Yorkshire coal field, where new populations are establishing themselves, and where already some impression has been made by the preaching of the liberal faith. Towards the end of the season this van, like No. 4 at the beginning of its season, will be on more familiar ground. In London the Van visits a number of churches that have specially asked for its services, and its coming is awaited with keen anticipation in some of these districts. I bespeak the hospitality and assistance of our friends in those places along the routes where the missionaries will make the acquaintance of our churches. It would facilitate our arrangements if information could be sent as to sites and any special ways in which we should be likely to render more effective service. We are embarking on our ninth campaign, but there must still be ideas that would be helpful if they could only reach us in time.

"I may add, too, that there is still room for more missionaries. From the outset the peculiar distinction of our Mission has been the voluntary character of the ministerial services; and some of the most active workers have taken part every year. Gaps, however, naturally occur, and one wants these filling. I should be grateful if I might hear from anyone who will help us in our seed sowing."

The following is the list of places in the provisional programme and the dates of the Van visits:—

No. 1 Van.—May 18 Tredegar, May 25 Rhymney; June 1 Whitweek, June 8 Sirhowy, June 15 Brynmawr, June 22 Abergavenny, June 29 Llanfihangel, Raglan; July 6 Monmouth, Coleford, July 13 Gloucester, July 20 Cheltenham, July 27 Tewkesbury, Upton; August 3 Malvern, August 10 Worcester, August 17 Droitwich, Stourport, August 24 Kidderminster, August 31 Stourbridge; September 7 Lye, September 14 Brierley Hill, September 21 Netherton, September 28 Gornal Wood.

No. 2 Van.—May 18 Gainsboro', May 25 Retford; June 1 no meetings, June 8 Worksop, June 15 Staveley, June 22 Eckington, June 29 Tinsley; July 6 Wath-on-Dearne, July 13 Bolton-on-Dearne, July 20 Bentley, Thurnscoe, July 27 Maltby; August 3 Doncaster, August 10 Barnsley, August 17 Wakefield, August 24 Dewsbury, August 31 Thornhill; September 7 Heckmondwike, September 14 Cleckheaton, September 21 Brighouse, September 28 Elland.

No. 3 Van.—May 18 Holloway, May 25 Leytonstone; June 15 Walthamstow, June 22 Limehouse, June 29 Stepney; July 6 Stamford-street, July 13 Forest Gate, July 20 Forest Gate, July 27 Stratford; August 3 Deptford, August 10 New Cross, August 17 Peckham, August 24 Clapham, August 31 Brixton; September 7 Balham, September 14 S. Norwood, September 21 Croydon.

No. 4 Van.—May 18 Ashton-in-Makerfield, May 25 Earlestown; June 8 Widnes, June 15 Runcorn, June 22 Chester, June 29 Buckley; July 6 Connah's Quay, July 13 Flint, July 20 Rhyl, July 27 Colwyn; August 3 Llandudno, August 10 Conway, August 17 Penmaenmawr, August 24 Bangor, August 31 Carnarvon; September 7 Llanfairfechan, Abergelle, September 14 Denbigh, September 21 Ruthin, Corwen, September 28 Llangollen.

Suggestions as to sites, and information as to names of friends will be welcomed by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, Missionary Agent, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

GERMAN NOTES.

TRAUB'S SUCCESSOR AT DORTMUND: FAILURE OF THE APPEAL—MEMORIAL TO JATHO—THE MOVEMENT AMONG FREE-THINKERS—HONORARY DEGREE FOR TRAUB.

THE appeal of the Reinoldigemeinde in Dortmund from the decision of the Münster Consistory to the Oberkirchenrat has been of no avail. The latter upholds the Consistory in its refusal to appoint Pfarrer Fuchs to the vacancy at Dortmund. The Presbytery of the Reinoldigemeinde say: "Although we do not consider it our duty to criticise in detail the decision of the Oberkirchenrat, we yet feel obliged to testify before the public how grievously we regret, as we did also during the proceedings against Pfarrer Traub, that the decision does not sufficiently take into consideration the conditions and requirements of our parish, nor the religious and theological ability and pastoral qualifications, as well as the character and efficiency of the minister-elect. We would exhort our members not to use this case as a means of provoking people to leave the State Church. We would rather beg earnestly that all will join us in continuing the struggle for the creation of a spirit of Christian gentleness and Protestant tolerance within all the branches of the Church."

The Rhenish-Westphalian Union of the Friends of Evangelical Freedom issued the following declaration:—"We measure the fitness of a minister of a Christian church which appeals to Luther by his religious and moral principles; and we consider the emphasis with which his character as an official of the State is considered, a contradiction of the mind and spirit of such a church. We therefore protest against this purely judicial sentence. . . . In our view of the matter the Church can only be served worthily by men whose heart is in the right place, and who work with acceptance in their profession. We demand of Protestant Church government that its decisions should be made from a religious point of view, and we ask: 'How long will it be possible for the religious boards in the Prussian State Church to strengthen by their actions the movement in favour of leaving the Church, and to take away from the majority of Protestants the joy of belonging to it, and to convulse it by numerous cases of intolerance?' "

On Palm Sunday, in loveliest weather, the monument erected over the resting-place of Pfarrer Karl Jatho was unveiled in the presence of Frau Jatho, his undaunted fellow-worker, of his last Konfirmanden, all carrying sheaves of flowers, and of many friends. Pfarrer Radecke, of Köln, Jatho's former colleague, dedicated the monument, which is adorned with a relief of a sower scattering seed. Pfarrer Traub also spoke, and delegates from many towns deposited wreaths. The occasion, though full of sadness, yet seemed like an inspiring celebration of the movement for which men like Jatho and Schrader fought until their last breath.

The Württembergische Union for Evangelical Liberty has made a formal pronouncement against the agitation which was started by the Committee Konfessionslos, and has been continued by the Proletarian Freethinkers. It sees in the union of Professors and Proletarians, which is said to have been made in the name of Liberty and Science, a mixture of intellectual and political aims, with a strong element of hostility to religion; and it fears that the result will be a weakening of the moral and religious fibre of the people. Not that criticism in this domain has no place, only that on account of its radicalism it lacks the sense of proportion, and is therefore sterile. A movement which results inevitably in the destruction of the only consolation and ultimate moral support of the great mass of the people, without providing anything to take its place, can only be described as a great danger to the life of the people. Far be it from us, this pronouncement continues, to deny that the Church is at fault. A hundred years ago she had a unique opportunity to usher in, hand in hand with the German people, the national resurrection. She refused, and placed herself instead at the disposal of political reaction. Thus she gained the reputation of having no desire to work either for the inner or outer deliverance of the people, and created the impression that the latter have nothing to hope from a Church which can only point believers to the future, and ties their hands in this life. This belief persists, and has been strengthened by the attitude of the Prussian Church Government. This is the real reason why the evangelical-social movement is distrusted by the people. In face of these difficulties the power of renewal must be sought in a free Protestantism which seeks to combine the heritage of the Reformation with the ideals of the spiritual and national awakening of a century ago.

In connection with the opening ceremony of the new buildings of the University of Zürich many honorary degrees were bestowed. Pfarrer Gottfried Traub received the title of Doctor honoris causa in Theology, and it was stated that the University gave it to him on account of his brave struggle for Protestant liberty. The distinction came to Traub as a great surprise. It must be a satisfaction to him to have this testimony from a great University, after the treatment meted out to him by the Prussian Oberkirchenrat. It is also a proof that Prussian Bureaucracy has little sympathy from outsiders in its condemnation of such a man. The thanks of all liberal-minded people are due to the brave men of Switzerland, who help to demonstrate that right remains right in the long run.

THE LATE REV. J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

It will be remembered by many of our readers that the late Rev. J. Worsley Austin was for four years minister of the Unitarian Church at Dedham, Massachusetts, before he returned to England and settled at Birmingham. The following tribute to his memory, written by a leading member of the congregation, has recently appeared in the Dedham Transcript:—"There are many in Dedham, in and out of the church over which he was settled, who recall him as a singularly attractive man and a loyal friend. He came among us from England as a stranger, young and unknown, but in his four years' stay he gained a warm place in the hearts of our people, and left the pleasantest memories when his duty called him to a larger field of usefulness in his native land. His style as a preacher was so simple and direct, so full of earnest conviction and with such a wealth of happy illustration that it made a profound impression upon his hearers, and to his congregation here it was a source of great regret that he felt called upon to leave them. He never lost his interest in Dedham, and those who had the good fortune to meet him at his pleasant home in Birmingham were surprised to find what eager enjoyment he took in recalling his friends and acquaintances here. His last word to the church in Dedham was the very impressive and interesting letter he sent for the 275th anniversary in November last. His untimely death at almost the beginning of a career of the greatest promise will be a severe blow to the whole denomination he so faithfully served, and in Dedham, where, in the short time he was with us, his winning personality had gained to an uncommon degree the confidence and affection of his people. He will be sincerely mourned as a strong and attractive preacher and a grand, true and lovable man."

WE regret very much to learn that news was received last week to the effect that Professor Eucken will be unable to visit England this year, and has had accordingly to cancel his numerous engagements in London at Whitsuntide. We understand that he has promised to send the lecture on "The Transient and Permanent in Christianity," which he was announced to deliver at Essex Hall on June 3, and it will probably soon be available in an English translation.

THE annual meetings of the Liberal Christian League will be held at Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool, on May 18, 19, and 20. The proceedings will begin on Monday at 7 with a devotional meeting, followed by a public service conducted by the Rev. Donald Fraser, and Dr. Drummond, of Oxford, who will preach the sermon. On Tuesday a conference on "The Social Demands of Religion" will be held at 3 p.m., in which the Revs. J. Fleming Shearer, H. D. Roberts, F. J. Marquis, M.A., Mr. R. Robinson, and Miss Alleyne (hon. secretary of the League), will take part, and at 8 o'clock Dr. Orchard, of Enfield, will deliver a lecture on "The Significance of Jesus for Modern Life." On Wednesday, at 3 p.m., the subject of "God in Modern Thought" will be discussed by the Revs. Dr. Stanley Mellor, A. J. Humphreys (vicar of St. Paul's, Accrington), Donald Fraser, and others. The public meeting, at which the Lord Mayor will take the chair, will be held at 8 o'clock, when Mrs. F. Roberts, the Revs. A. J. Humphreys and M. F. Bovenizer, and Mr. Lawrence Holt will speak on "The Religion and the State the age needs."

THE third Summer School arranged by the Conference of Social Service Unions will be held at The Hayes, Swanwick, Derbyshire, from June 20-29, opening on Saturday evening at 8 o'clock, when an address will be given by Mr. H. G. Wood on "The Restoration of Arcady." The only united meeting of the school on Sunday will be held in the afternoon at 3 o'clock, when the Bishop of Oxford, Chairman of the Conference, Dr. Garvie, and the Rev. Charles Plater, S.J., will give addresses. Although formal arrangements for devotional exercises are not included in the set programme, members of each denomination will find that their respective needs have been provided for. The discussions throughout the week will deal with the subject of "Land and Labour," under the following heads:—"The Approach from History," Prof. W. J. Ashley; "The Life of the Village Labourer," Mr. George Edwards; "Wages of Rural Labourers," Mr. Charles Roden Buxton; "The Re-Construction of Village Life," Mr. P. Lloyd-Greame; "Our Present System of Land Tenure," Mr. Christopher Turnor; "Co-operation with Special Reference to Small Holdings," Mr. J. Nugent Harris; "The Housing Problem," Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree; "The City Beautiful," Mr. Raymond Unwin; "Private Property in Land," Mr. J. W. Hills, M.P., D.C.L.; "State Control and State Ownership," Mr. E. Richard Cross; "What the Individual can do," Lord Henry Bentinck, and "The Spiritual Aspect of the Land Question," Mr. J. St. George Heath. Among those taking the chair at the various discussions will be the Dean of Lincoln, the Rev. George Canning, S.J., Miss Margaret Ashton, the Bishop of Winchester, and Mrs. Mackenzie, of the Friends' Social Union.

Full particulars can be obtained from Miss Lucy Gardner, 92, St. George's-square, London, S.W.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

CO-OPERATION AT OXFORD.

THE Zeitgeist which for the last decade and more has been hotly bombarding the University of Oxford has recently made another advance. Within a measurable space of time, if present indications are not deceptive, our older Universities will become what Universities ought to be, the seed plot of new ideas, and not merely an asylum for decrepit and moribund causes that could not survive the more robust climate of the everyday world. Oxford—or at any rate some hopeful spirits at the University—has started co-operative stores on classic ground—in the High, to be more explicit, not far from the Turl. The two undergraduates who have been chiefly concerned in the management both belong to Christ Church, a circumstance which is a portent in itself. They have at their backs the support not only of a large number of undergraduates, but of many of the ablest and less crusted dons, and of many distinguished ex-Oxford men like Lord Rosebery. At times the demand for goods at the new stores has been so great that the committee in charge of the venture have had to help the trade staff. Mr. Bryan, who with Mr. Underwood is the moving spirit of the venture, was secretary of the co-operative established some time ago at Dublin University with the benediction of the Provost and other science Fellows of T.C.D., and the warm support of "A. E." (Mr. George Russell) in that remarkable paper, the Irish Homestead.

* * *

There is no use trying to blink the fact that the cost of living at Oxford is far higher than it ought to be, with the result that some of the most promising intellectual material in the country is debarred from entering the University. The tradition has been that tradespeople mostly dealt on the credit system, and obviously, as the typical Oxford undergraduate is frequently dilatory and occasionally dishonest, shopkeepers have had to do without their money for long periods, or possibly do without it altogether. Consequently prices were very much higher than if the system had been delivery for cash only. Moreover, a lowering of prices is desirable not only in the interests of individuals but of college kitchens, many of which have been managed (or rather mismanaged) on wildly uneconomic and uncommercial lines. Cecil Rhodes' notion that the Oxford don was only a child in these matters was only too true. If the college bursars put their heads together the cost of living for the undergraduate might be very considerably reduced.

When Dublin University started its co-operative, "A. E." thought it might have the effect of a universal scholarship by the great reduction which it would bring about in the expense of a University career. The indirect effects, however, will be far more important. Something will be done to destroy the ineffably silly convention that it is infra dig. for an Oxford student to buy his own necessities or pay for them at the time of purchase, or concern himself more than at the brief moment of writing a cheque with the cost of his keep. Perhaps, too, this new move will perceptibly hasten the time when it will be considered a scandal for any Oxford student, and most of all for those who teach within the walls of the University, to be without some elementary practical experience in managing their own affairs in an economical and business-like way.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Blackpool, South Shore.—The annual sale of work was held on Wednesday, April 29, Mrs. H. Bodell Smith, president of the Sewing Society, in the chair. Lady Leigh, of Lytham, performed the opening ceremony. The proceeds reached the total of £72. This will make it possible to reduce the debt on the church building, which a little over a year ago was £420, to the sum of £280.

Bolton.—Unity Church reports a successful Sunday-school anniversary last Sunday, when the preacher, afternoon and evening, was the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of London. The collections were £43.

Chatham.—The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman has announced his resignation of the pulpit of the Hamond Hill Unitarian Church on his acceptance of an invitation to take charge of the Hurst-street Domestic Mission, Birmingham, in succession to the late Rev. W. J. Clarke. The resignation will take effect at the end of July. During the six years of Mr. Morgan Whiteman's ministry at Chatham much good work has been done. In celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the opening of the present building a special fund was raised and the interior has just been completely renovated.

Crewkerne.—Anniversary services in connection with the Unitarian Sunday-school were held on Sunday, May 3, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie preached morning and evening. The minister, the Rev. A. Sutcliffe, B.A., conducted a scholars' service in the afternoon. There were large congregations.

Ilford.—A meeting of the Ilford branch of the British Women's League was held on Wednesday afternoon, April 29, in the Lecture Hall of the Unitarian Church, 65 being present. Mrs. E. R. Fyson was in the chair, and an address was delivered by Mrs. W. Blake Odgers on "Character." A vote of thanks to the lecturer was proposed at the close of the proceedings by Mrs. Indge.

London : Bell-street Mission.—At a farewell social gathering to which the Rev. R. P. and Mrs. Farley invited members and friends of the mission on Thursday evening, April 30, the opportunity was taken of presenting Mr. Farley with an illuminated address placing on record the appreciation and affection which he has won during the seven years he has been working at Bell-street. Miss Holland, who acted as chairman, said that in giving expression to their regret at losing Mr. and Mrs. Farley, they were glad to know that there was no prospect of Mr. Farley leaving London, so that he would still be able to visit his old friends at the Mission. Mr. Dunt, the secretary of the Bell-street Congregational Union, in making the presentation, referred in warm terms to Mr. Farley's work, which had made the Mission a good going concern in every respect. The first part of the address was as follows:—"We, the members of the Bell-street Mission, in presenting this address to you as a token of our love and regard wish also to express our regret at your departure. For seven years you have been our minister and friend, and during that time we have never looked to you in vain for guidance or sympathy. In the hour of our inmost need your kindly word has cheered and helped us, and in our hearts will be engraven the memory of many kindnesses. Those of us who have been with you know something of the difficulties and trials you have encountered in your work, and recognise in the present success of the People's Hall the result of your careful administration. We desire therefore to record our gratefulness and appreciation of your labours." An illuminated address was also presented on behalf of the Marylebone Men's Club by Mr. Molloy, a member of the committee, and Councillor J. T. O'Brien in a very cordial speech alluded to the sterling work which had been done at the Mission during Mr. Farley's ministry, and to the great usefulness of the Men's Club, which owed its establishment to him, in such a neighbourhood as Lisson Grove. Only those who laboured among working men could realise what a vast amount of good had been done by means of this institution. The Rev. F. Summers, speaking as a fellow missionary, referred to Mr. Farley's predecessors at Bell-street, and said that they had to congratulate him on the fact that, unlike them, he was leaving in full vigour and strength, ready for fresh work in other directions. The Rev. R. P. Farley, in replying, spoke of the aims he had tried to follow out in his work at Bell-street, of the loyalty with which he had been supported by his fellow-workers and the members of the Mission, and of the great value to himself of the knowledge of human nature and social conditions gained during the seven years he had been amongst them. He did not regard his connection with them as severed, and in taking up other work he would only be carrying on what he had begun at Bell-street, though it might take a different form, and would result, he hoped, in drawing the attention of a wider circle of people to the objects he had at heart. Both the illuminated addresses were the work of Mr. George Birt, a loyal worker at the Mission, whose mother has for more than 20 years been a member of the Mothers' Union.

London : Blackfriars.—The Rev. W. Piggott commences his open-air mission this week. By the kindness of private friends, aided by the Church Committee, a handsome portable pulpit has been made, and the mission will go on week after week until the late autumn. The ground has been prepared by the distribution of the calendar and suitable tracts.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Very successful and encouraging anniversary services were held at the Church of the Divine Unity, on Sunday, April 27, when the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool, was the preacher. His address in the evening on "The Modern Demands on the Religious Man" was an appropriate appeal to those present to give of their ability and strength to the cause of the Church. On the following Monday the anniversary meetings were held, the minister, the Rev. Alfred Hall, being in the chair. He alluded to the satisfactory condition of the church and its institutions, and spoke of the good work that had been done in the past year. Mr.

Roberts made a telling speech in answer to the question: "Is the work of our Liberal Churches at an end?" He made a series of apt quotations from the works of Lindsey and Priestley, and showed how far the churches had to travel even to reach the broad ideal maintained by the leaders of a hundred years ago.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

EDUCATION IN HOUSING PROBLEMS.

An Imperial Housing Conference and Exhibition will be held from May 18 to 21 at the Imperial Institute, in connection with the Victoria League Imperial Health Conference and Exhibition. This will afford an opportunity for those interested in the housing problem to arm themselves with facts and illustrations that will be of special value to them in studying or speaking on the subject, and Mr. T. Nicolson, hon. organiser, will be glad to hear from ministers and representatives who are visiting London to attend the May Meetings with a view to forming parties to inspect the models, plans, &c., under the guidance of experts. Free tickets will also be available to all who send their names and addresses to him at the offices of the Victoria League, 6, Bloomsbury-square, W.C.

MR. JOHN BURNS ON "LABOUR AND DRINK."

The Lees and Raper Memorial Lecture on "Labour and Drink," delivered by Mr. John Burns in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, on October 31, 1904, has just been re-issued in revised form at the price of one penny. The pamphlet consists of 48 pages and cover, and is well printed on good paper and in readable type. It is now nearly ten years since "Labour and Drink" was issued to the public, and during that period a very large number of copies have been sold. It is probable that no other utterance, of similar compactness, on the temperance question has been of anything like so great service to the cause, and the Lees-Raper Trustees, being of opinion that the lecture had yet a long career of usefulness before it, have obtained the assent of Mr. Burns to its re-issue in its present form. The figures have been brought up to date as far as was possible without interfering unduly with the original form of the lecture, and it is hoped that as it is published at a low price, the lecture in its revised form may have a further large circulation. Specimen copies, with terms for quantities, may be obtained from the offices of the United Kingdom Alliance, 16, Deansgate, Manchester, and 11, Tothill-street, London, S.W.

PROTECTING THE YOUNG IN FRANCE.

France has started a "Cradle Band of Hope" for infants up to seven years of age, their mothers making engagements for their little ones, and promising not to give them any drink containing alcohol. The headquarters of this special branch are at 53 bis, Rue Saint-Lazare, Paris. A campaign conducted by the Blue Cross Society in the North of France has been very encouraging in its results. At some of the meetings the young people were much in evidence, entering heartily into the engagements. At the close, subscriptions were raised sufficient to guarantee the support of an agent and an office during the next three years. It is satisfactory to know that temperance work in France is not confined to the Protestants. The Catholics have a society called the "White Cross," and it continues to issue its monthly paper entitled "The Golden Cross." The last number begins with an earnest appeal to the young members not only to be true to their vows of abstinence, but to faithfully support their Society. The paper bears in its title the motto: "Honour, Health, Happiness."

THE USE OF "MOVING PICTURES."

The real dangers connected with moving picture shows in regard to their effect upon the mind of the child were touched upon by a writer in these columns a week or two ago, and some assurance that the subject is receiving the earnest consideration of educationists and social workers will be welcomed by those who are not satisfied with the present state of things. Writing in Progress in April, Mr. Morley Dañow gives an account of the formation of the Educational Kinematograph Association, of which he is the hon. secretary, as the result of a meeting held in January and addressed by Dr. Lyttelton, Mr. Alfred Percival Graves, Dr. Kimmins, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, and others. A provisional committee, he says, has now commenced the work of drawing up a scheme for the right use of the kinematograph as a moral and spiritual and intellectual influence. It is pointed out, by way of illustrating what may be done, that the Japanese Board of Education has for years past used pictures for instruction in ethics in all Japanese schools, showing how in certain cases not only grown-up people but children should act; in Germany to-day children on leaving school are shown moving pictures of certain industries, giving fair details of the work and the conditions, which are a great help to the children in deciding what profession they should enter; in the United States the education of the public in matters of health, agriculture, and horticulture is being actively carried on by the same means, and in England the Women's Imperial Health Association is showing films which combine the telling of a story with hints on health. It is also interesting to know that an exhibition of films was recently shown in London under the auspices of the Architectural Association. All this leads us to hope that a time will soon come when the kinematograph may be reckoned as one of the civilising factors of modern times. It is, we may add, of the greatest importance that the machinery used for the display of films should be improved so as to do away with the constant flicker which is so trying to the eyesight of all who watch moving pictures for any length of time.

A MEMORIAL TO NIETZSCHE.

In view of the seventieth anniversary of Nietzsche's birth, which falls on October 15, it is intended to raise a monument to his memory on the hill near Weimar in the neighbourhood of the Nietzsche Archiv. A considerable sum has already been collected, and any surplus that may accrue will be used for the support of the Nietzsche Archiv, which, under the guidance of Nietzsche's sister, Mrs. Förster-Nietzsche, has done so much to promote the study of his teaching. "It is likewise proposed," writes Mr. Oscar Levy, editor of the English translation of Nietzsche's works, "that this latter institution shall be constituted an intellectual centre for securing that cultural unity of Europe which must precede its political and commercial union." This sounds like an aristocratic form of Norman Angellism, and holds out a delightful prospect of universal amity which, we fear, Nietzsche would have contemplated with horror.

THE CATHOLIC FAITH IN SEVILLE.

The writer of a series of articles in the Times on "Spring in Spain," gives an interesting description of the processions which take place during Holy Week in Seville, and describes the intimate way in which the Spanish people, "still Catholic in soul," and full of childlike faith, make the Virgin and the Saints sharers of their joys and sorrows, as dear and familiar as friends and neighbours. As an illustration of this he recalls an incident related by a friend, himself a clergyman, who stayed in a village in the Apennines. "Observing that his landlady prayed much to the Virgin for her sickly child, he asked why she addressed all her entreaties to Our Lady and did not sometimes invoke the aid of Christ Himself. 'His heart is kind,' was the reply, 'but what should He know about the ailments of children? It is His Mother who understands these things.'" Incidents of this kind reveal to us in a singularly vivid way the sources of Mariolatry, which is so inseparably associated with human needs and affections.

THE PAGEANT OF GENEVA.

Few places lend themselves more appropriately to the pomp of historical pageantry than Geneva, which will celebrate in June, after this fashion, the 100th anniversary of the admission of the Canton to the Swiss Confederation. It has witnessed so many political and religious struggles, it has defended its independence so gallantly, and it has received with hospitality so many notable strangers and religious refugees. Those who fled from the Marian persecutions in England, those who were frightened out of France by the Massacre of St. Bartholemew's Day, those whose homes were broken up by the Edict of Nantes, all were made welcome in Geneva. It was in that city, for instance, as a correspondent in the Times reminds us, that John Knox, living in what he described as "the most perfect school of Christ that ever was in the earth since the days of the Apostles," sat down and wrote "The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women," which contains sentiments that would hardly find favour to-day regarding the place women should occupy in the scheme of things.

BLACK. (8 men.)

White to play and mate in two moves.

SOLUTION TO No. 54.

1. R. Kt3 (key-move).

Correct solutions have been received from O. Lupton, Rev. I. Wrigley, E. C. (Highbury), Dr. Higginson, Rev. B. C. Constable, E. Wright, R. B. D. (Edinburgh), F. S. M. (Mayfield), D. Amos, W. E. Arkell, H. L. (Torquay), A. S. Rodgers, W. T. M. (Sunderland).

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DR. C. G. HIGGINSON.—Your analysis of No. 54 is quite correct. Mr. Kipping's problem is, as you say, worthy of most careful study; the two possible K moves seem to indicate careless construction, but close analysis proves this little problem to be a deeper one than appears superficially. As to No. 55, the multiple continuations do detract, but the tourney was in the spirit of Loyd, who was not over particular, so long as "snap" and bright play were present.

No. 56 was one of a quartet of two-movers published in the French magazine La Stratégie, and was sent without the Black P at QR3, a fatal omission. Perhaps solvers may be interested to trace what is the consequence of removing this P from the board. It was quoted in the British Chess Magazine, and described by Mr. Laws (the Problem Editor) as being a particularly smart "changed-mate" two-er. He overlooked the blemish, however. These problems always mean the very minutest care to secure soundness, as it is the intention of the author to win the day by a peculiar form of waiting strategy, and as the precise method must be the only method, all threats and other waiting-moves have to be carefully guarded against.

THE WORKING FAITH OF A LIBERAL THEOLOGIAN.

By the Rev. T. RHONDDA WILLIAMS.

The author shows how the fidelities of the soul can not only be preserved but deepened when the mind has freed itself from the trammels of external authority in religion. It is not a book of arguments on theological questions, but a demonstration of the forces and power of spiritual faith.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SOCIAL reformers will view the defeat of the Sunday Closing Bill in the House of Commons last week with deep regret not unmingled with dismay. There was no doubt some well-organised opposition to the Bill, but this was greatly helped by the widespread indifference of many members, from whom the public had a right to expect better things. No doubt the electric atmosphere of Parliament during the last few weeks has produced a certain lassitude of mind in regard to ordinary matters of legislation. Many other topics have also come to the front in recent years, and tend to absorb much of the enthusiasm which was formerly given to Temperance reform. But the terrible menace still remains as one of the most deadly cankers in our social system. Society must use its right to complete control over the Trade, or the Trade in a hundred subtle and corrupting ways will control Society. The Sunday Closing Bill would, in our opinion, have placed no unreasonable restraint upon anybody, and at the same time it would have helped to make Sunday a better and happier day for tens of thousands of people.

THE idea that some restriction in the hours when it is lawful to trade is quite justifiable had the strong support of Mr. Churchill at the dinner held last week to celebrate the jubilee of the Saturday half-holiday. He confessed, however, that the Shops Act had been a disappointment to him. He regarded it as a mere salvage from a wreck of a measure. There was no Bill for which he had been responsible over which he had taken more trouble, or which had carried such a small proportion to the Statute Book of its original intentions. But after all, in spite of all the insoluble difficulties, the Act of 1912 had given them the universal statutory half-holiday. But, he contended, it would be the greatest mistake to suppose that the work which had been done completed the exertions of the Early Closing Association. The work still to be done was far greater than the work which had been accomplished. They had to form public opinion and secure the legal regulation of the hours worked by shop assistants.

THE third annual meeting of the British Council of Churches to promote friendly relations between England and Germany was held in London last week. Evidently the speakers found it difficult to say anything new upon the subject. When friendship exists protestations become superfluous. For a variety of reasons we have passed away from the period of strained relations and lurid scares which caused so much anxiety a few years ago. In these circumstances friendship may be left to pursue its own natural and peaceful course. But it is a good thing that from time to time it should obtain corporate expression in ways which are calculated to strengthen public opinion and to encourage the temper of generosity and wise thoughtfulness at every point where our own life touches that of another country.

THE meetings of the Women's International Council in Rome have been marked by variety and breadth of interest, and have borne striking witness to the practical identity of the problems and ideals with which all civilised communities are confronted. In her opening address Lady Aberdeen devoted special attention to the problems of childhood. "We claim the right of the child," she said, "to be well born, and the claim may mean much which we do not yet see clearly. It means that if disease or crime or ignorance or vicious indulgence interfere with the right to be well born, we must take in hand the education of parents and teachers, nurses and doctors, instead of continuing the conspiracy of silence which has ruined many lives. If the right to be well born is admitted, the right to grow up must follow; . . . and then we have to consider the environment of the child during infancy and childhood, its right to be happy and to have the chance of expressing spontaneously the joyousness of childhood, its right to be so trained that it will be prepared to take part in the work of life with joy and dignity, not crushed by excessive hours and unproductive labour. . . . It is the right of every new generation to advance beyond that which has gone before, and parents and all who have the charge of children must set it before them to make the new generation begin where we left off, so that they shall climb on our shoulders to higher life, attainments, and power to serve their fellow-men."

At the session of the Congress held on Wednesday, Mrs. Anna Howard Shaw proposed the following resolution, which was carried unanimously :—

“ Realising the rapidly changing character of problems that must now be considered by Governments, and seeing that these problems increasingly affect the moral and educational and industrial life of the people, it is increasingly important that women should recognise their responsibility in national life. This International Women's Congress re-affirms the earnest belief that the right of voting in Parliamentary and local elections should be given to women in all countries where representative Governments exist.”

* * *

THE pamphlet, after a period of eclipse, is resuming its place as a weapon in political and religious controversy. The issue of Canon Sanday's reply to the Bishop of Oxford in a pamphlet of 30 pages is one of the important events of the week. Its importance consists in this, that it states the liberal position with the clearness and moderation of tone which only the great scholar can command; and at the same time it announces the conversion of the writer to many of the positions which the Bishop of Oxford has told the world he considers to be inconsistent with the obligations of a clergyman. No doubt Dr. Gore was quite unaware that his charges of insincerity would wound one so widely honoured and beloved as Dr. Sanday, and the discovery may possibly cause him a good deal of searching of heart. It will be very difficult for him to modify or withdraw anything that he has written, and at the same time it will be equally difficult and most repugnant to his best feelings to inhibit Dr. Sanday as a heretic whose voice must not be heard in his diocese. We doubt whether public opinion would tolerate such action, for he is not a young and comparatively obscure man like the Rev. J. M. Thompson. What, then, will Dr. Gore do?

These are some of the dramatic possibilities of the situation. Meanwhile let us glance at the pamphlet itself. The reader will be struck at once by the exquisite courtesy of its manner. “I must confess,” Dr. Sanday writes, “that I began this pamphlet in an indignant mood. I have tried to remove the traces of this, and I shall be glad if I have in some measure succeeded.” Combined with this courtesy there is the modest candour of the great scholar. On every page there is the revelation of a mind which is still growing. He confesses that the thought and study of the last two years have caused him to see many things differently, that he has learned much from the writings of younger men whose conclusions he was inclined at first to controvert. Seldom has the student of great religious issues taken the public so completely into his confidence in revealing the slow and cautious steps by which the mind which is really open to evidence advances from point to point, till at last a completely new position is reached without any loss of vital religious faith. This is not the speech of a rash innovator. Dr. Sanday indeed confesses that he hardly felt ready to express himself so fully, but the occasion forbade delay. “A situation had suddenly arisen in the Church which acutely touched myself, and I felt it impossible to keep silence.”

POSSIBLY this gentleness of manner will disarm some of the opposition. But even at a first reading it will be seen that the conclusions are startling and deeply disturbing to many old-fashioned opinions. The pamphlet deals almost exclusively with Old Testament criticism. After expressing general approval of Dr. Gore's sympathetic attitude towards the results of Old Testament criticism Dr. Sanday continues :—

“If the Bishop brought the same clear-sightedness to bear upon the study of the New Testament that he has brought to bear on that of the Old, I submit that various expressions would have been considerably chastened. . . One of the determining stages in the history of my own thought has been the gradually growing conviction that it is impossible to draw any clear line of demarcation between the New Testament and the Old; nay, that the New Testament must be even more liable to the same kind of influences as the Old, because, whereas the Old Testament writers shaped their own methods of writing history for themselves, the New Testament writers followed throughout the model of the Old Testament; their minds were full of the Old Testament narratives, and there was a natural tendency to assimilate their own narratives to them.”

BUT it is when he comes to the question of miracles, and especially the small group of miracles upon which Dr. Gore lays such stress, that Dr. Sanday really touches the heart of the matter and announces his own change of view. “I do not think,” he says, “that the evidence is sufficient to convince us that ‘the physical elevation’ of the Lord's body really happened as an external, objective fact.” He speaks in similar terms of the physical miracle of the Birth and the Resurrection, and associates himself quite definitely with the scholars of the left wing against whom Dr. Gore formulates his indictment. “I must begin,” he writes, “by associating myself more definitely than I have hitherto done with the group of writers whom the Bishop has in his mind. It is only within the last two years—or rather through a process of thought spread over the last two years—that I have been led to go, or come to feel inclined to go, as far as some of them do.”

* * *

HERE then is the position, expressed without a shadow of reserve and in language which has been chosen with scrupulous care so that it may convey his meaning, and at the same time wound as little as possible. Let it be said in conclusion that Dr. Sanday conveys the impression in every line that he has written, that his new attitude has not modified in any degree the richness and depth of his religious loyalties and affections. He still believes with fulness of conviction the truth which he finds enshrined in the ancient creeds. There is a note of confident challenge in these closing sentences: “If it is said that what I have written is Modernism, I would reply that I believe—I emphatically and hopefully believe—that a sound and right Modernism is really possible; that the Saviour of mankind extends His arms towards the cultivated modern man just as much as He does towards the simple believer. I believe that the cultivated modern man may enter the Church of Christ with his head erect—with some change of language due to difference of times, but all of the nature of reinterpretation of old truths, and without any real equivocation at his heart. I believe that he can afford to say what he really thinks—provided only that his fellow Christians of more traditional types are willing to greet him with the sympathetic intelligence which he deserves, and do not turn towards him the cold shoulder of suspicion and denunciation.”

* * *

A MEMORIAL to Dr. Collyer, which is to take the form of a portrait relief in bronze, of heroic size, and showing about two-thirds of the figure, will be placed when finished on the west wall of the Church of the Messiah, New York. It is the work of Mr. Henry Hering, a well-known American sculptor. The announcement was first made by the trustees a year ago that they had undertaken to provide a fitting monument to the memory of Dr. Collyer, but there was for some time much uncertainty as to the character of the memorial and the expense that would be involved. Subscriptions are still being received by Mr. William Shillaber, treasurer of the Robert Collyer Memorial Fund, 60, Wall-street, New York, and it is hoped that the sum required, $6,000, will soon be in hand.

THE HORIZONS OF THE SOUL.

THERE are few of the adjustments of life which it is so hard to make wisely and well as that between narrow surroundings and large ideals. The narrow surroundings, in spite of all that may be said against them, bring their own blessing. They help to give warmth and personal colour to our affections, to concentrate our efforts upon practical tasks, and to save us from the dishonour of mistaking beautiful dreams for Christian faithfulness. On the other hand, they often encourage short-sighted views of life. They make it easy for us to be ignorant or contemptuous of the great things of the world, which lie beyond our own parish boundaries. They banish first into obscurity and then into complete forgetfulness the wide horizons of the soul. This is one of the besetting dangers of our loyalty to sect and party in religion, unless affection for our own party is kept clean from every taint of partisanship and the sect is honoured chiefly because it is the means of giving distinctive expression to something greater than itself, to the Spirit of God in the world or to some far-reaching historical movement, from which it derives most of its nutriment and power. English Nonconformity has suffered severely in this way, partly through the intensity of its concern for its own affairs, but even more on account of the discipline of restraint and disability imposed upon it from without. It has guarded its own historical records; it has formed its own calendar of saints; it has fashioned a type of churchmanship in which local and family affections blend with the peculiar features of its message. But it has not found it easy to realise that, after all, it is only a short chapter in the long procession of Christian history. Even in the spacious air of the present day it is often more at its ease in the quiet resting-places of its own memories than in the new movements of thought and spiritual endeavour, which have no further use for the sharp lines of division and many of the faded watch-words of the past.

In an article on Church and Nation in the Westminster Gazette on Tuesday, which gives the substance of an address to the Congregational Union, Dr. FORSYTH, with his customary boldness and decision, brushes aside the old bad habit of thinking in closed compartments. "Christianity is inseparably bound up with organic history," he tells us. "A religion indifferent to history, whether the history of CHRIST, or of the world, or of the nation, has no message for the age." At once the scales fall from the eyes and the wide horizons are disclosed. It is not that the chapter of local history loses its importance or survives simply as the tender memory of a day that is dead. It is caught up into the majestic flow of a much larger movement, which alone can give it intrinsic importance. We are no longer content to look at the objects which stand nearest to us in the foreground, or to keep company with the few men in the crowd who happen to be of our fashion. We want to see the whole picture, with its wonder of shifting light and shade and its illimitable distances and the insistent appeal of things which in their strange beauty and depth of meaning we only dimly understand. Following out this conception of the organic unity of history Dr. FORSYTH writes as follows:—

"Some of our views, therefore, about the Church and the nation may require revision—not in principle, but in form. Some of them were formulated in an age when our present notions of society were not yet born, during the reign of an individualism, aggressive and metallic, whose clang is now fading into the past. They were framed when, as psychology had not got beyond thinking of the soul as a faggot of faculties, so sociology had not outgrown the atomic theory into that of a moral organism; when the majority principle was as yet unmodified by that of the group-person; when the State was regarded as secular and undivine; when the sects had not grown up into Churches; when the unity of the Church was hardly even a dream; when certain views of history did not extend beyond CROMWELL and his great legacy; and when even CROMWELL stood out on a background of English and Protestant history only, and not upon the great spiritual history of the West and the World."

No one can enter with any degree of sympathetic understanding into the meaning of a passage like this without seeing that it is a call to men to breathe a larger and more stimulating air and to take their place in the movement of the Christian spirit through the ages. The Nonconformist is no longer to be satisfied with his Bible and his meagre chapter of English history. Without losing his magnificent individuality and his power, when need be, to stand alone, he is to cease to be a mere provincial and to claim his franchise in the Empire of the Spirit.

The effect of this change of attitude will be seen very clearly in three directions. In the first place, it will immensely enlarge the area of spiritual culture. Nonconformist history will cease to be studied in isolation, a method which distorts all its values and obliterates half its meaning. The centuries which intervene between the peace of the Church and the coming of Luther will no longer be dismissed as dark ages, except when some bold heretic or reformer raises his head and makes his protest. The inner life of the Catholic Church, the splendour of its heroism and the piercing vision of its saints, will begin to bear its witness within the souls of men who no longer bow at her altars. And there will arise a sense of unity, not the obliteration of all differences or the certainty of victory for ourselves, but the unity of a rich and varied life, which has its springs in the Life of God Himself and his purposes of love and goodness for the world.

In the second place, it will lift all the duties of citizenship, the whole area of State activity, into close alliance with Christian faith; and at the same time it will give to the most trivial incidents of personal or local religion a sense of largeness as they are brought into relation with the moving forces of history and the world-wide activities of the Divine Spirit in the causes of freedom, justice and peace. Our old atomic way of thinking was responsible for the idea of the secular State, in which the sphere of religion was carefully marked off from that of politics or social reform. It was due to narrow vision and lack of spiritual imagination, and has collapsed completely at the touch of our new sense of the intimacy with which religion blends with all the interests of life. Few people have any heartfelt belief in it to-day, though it survives in deeply ingrained habits of timidity and a curious slowness even among the convinced to develop all the implications of the discovery that our division of history into sacred and secular is one of convenience only, and loses all its meaning at the bar of Christian judgment. But here we may venture upon another quotation from Dr. FORSYTH:—

"Psychologically," he says, "the Church and the nation cannot be related only as London neighbours are. They cannot ignore each other even in the lift. You cannot put a gulf down the centre of the soul. Society is not atomic, but also the soul is not divisible. Personality cannot be cleft. We cannot have a watertight door between the citizen and the saint in the same man; no more can we in the same nation. And if churchmen and statesmen cannot be disjoined in any strong personality, they cannot be neutral in any society of such people."

In the third place, these wider horizons of which we have been speaking, so far from encouraging vagueness, will help forward the work of concentration. The more parochial we become in our thinking and the less we see our own effort in its relation to the organic movement of history, the more likely we are to expend a large amount of energy upon the secondary things, which seem needful if we are to defend our position against other people, or by successful attack to score a victory for our own side. It is a sad spectacle, this waste of human power because religious men have been more intent upon beating one another in argument or refuting a false theology than upon doing the will of God and spreading the Gospel of His all-conquering love. It is good for us to see how small many of these things really are, how little they count in any final valuation of life, when we lift up our eyes and scan the wide horizons of the soul. Dr. FORSYTH reminds his Nonconformist readers that the superstition of the inevitableness of war, drink, and vice is far more deadly, because more intimate to our society, than any superstition of the Mass. This is a piece of plain speaking, which is clearly meant to search out the weak places of some Protestant people, who think that anti-Catholic prejudice will be counted to them for righteousness. But it is a word of equal application to us all in the moods when we forget the primary things of faith and the imperial mission of the Church in devotion to the subordinate interests of our own local party or national group, and offer men the dead watch-words of controversy instead of a new vision of the Highest. The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost, not by teaching a new theology, but by planting the redeeming love of God at the centre of the soul.

RELIGION AND THE SUPERNORMAL.

THE inquiring mind of the twentieth century, not content with the triumphs won in aerial navigation, polar exploration, medical science, and the manifold discoveries which are the result of modern knowledge, is now claiming dominion over the realm of the psychic too. Have our excursions here been equally successful? The airship, the submarine, the motor car have won success at the cost of many human lives. Do we pay no toll for our increased knowledge of the psychic, and, if we do, is the gain worth the sacrifice? These are questions which call for an answer when we see on every side abundant evidence of the prominence into which the occult has leapt at the present day. It meets us in many forms, which appeal respectively to the religious and the scientific, the intelligent and the foolish, the curious and the hysterical. The spiritualists appeal to all these types when they tell us that they have solved beyond all doubt the question of the survival of personality after death, and that they can comfort the doubter and the mourner by actual proofs of eye and ear that those who have gone before can still communicate with us. The disciples of the "New" Thought proclaim that man is neglecting potentialities in his nature which, would he but learn to cultivate them, would abolish pain and disease, and bring him success in his life, vigour and poise and power to his whole personality. Mental and spiritual healers, and people possessed of hypnotic power, claim their share with medical science in alleviating the pain and suffering of the world.

And then there is a whole army of clairvoyants, palmists, astrologists, phrenologists, and fortune-tellers, who profess to—and often do—read the secrets of other people's lives, describe their characters with great minuteness, predict their futures, warn them against enemies, advise them as to their conduct—in fact, offer them a general supervision of their most intimate concerns. By these I do not mean only the public professors of occult arts who are frequently in trouble with the police, nor the foreign-looking gentlemen with uncanny eyes who stare at us from the advertisement columns of papers and magazines, inviting us to come—or write—to them, and learn how to make a success of our business, whom and when to marry, &c. Nowadays most of us count among our own friends one at least who is "psychic," and have seen for ourselves incontestable proofs of very remarkable powers.

For the day of scepticism with regard to these things is over. However much fraud and quackery and charlatanism is to be found amongst the professed exponents of occultism (as it always will be found, so long as such powers are made use of for monetary gain) only very ignorant or very prejudiced people can continue to assert that "there is nothing in it." It is just because there is so much in it that it behoves us to go very cautiously—to ask ourselves, whether we are on the right lines when we strive to harness these mighty, mysterious powers to serve our petty, utilitarian ends, as we harness the forces of steam and electricity.

The modern scientific spirit has brought about an immense reaction from the mediæval view of the "black art." What superstitious people once fled from in terror, scientific ones now seek out and investigate. This is as it should be. But there is always the danger of exploiting the new knowledge for ulterior ends, of indulging in a species of bravado, and pretending a complete mastery over powers which we do not really understand. There may still be something of the untamed beast about our new protégé, whose devotees may find that they have put their heads into its mouth for mere vulgar display once too often. What, especially, has religion, in whose name such manifestations were wont to be rigorously condemned, to say to modern occultism? Is it, as some think, a legitimate plank in the platform of the Christian apologist, and may we now re-affirm the old truths with a new certainty born of the discoveries of psychic science and the cult of the supernormal? Or is it, on the other hand, a dangerous and pernicious influence, inimical to the cause of true religion, and redolent of the fumes of that infernal chasm in which Dante found the diviners?

The answer probably lies somewhere between these two extremes. That some attempt should be made to find it appears eminently desirable at a time when the question has become vital for many thinking people. It is proposed in these papers to examine very briefly the loss and gain to the spiritual life involved in the various manifestations of the occult, and to base on the results of such examination some conclusions as to the place which the psychic should occupy in the equipment of the Christian.

We shall consider these manifestations in the following order:—(1) Spiritualism. (2) Mental Healing and New Thought. (3) Clairvoyance and Telepathy.

I.

The proudest boast of the spiritualists is that, whereas the average religious man has to face the problem of a future life upon the slippery and uncertain ground of faith, they are firmly planted upon a rock of fact. Where he believes, they know. Where he professes to find comfort for the loss of his dear ones in some such vague assurance as that "the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and there shall no evil touch them," they can triumphantly point to the evidence of the senses. They have established communications with the unseen; they have received actual messages from the dead; they can produce spirit-writing and spirit-photographs in proof of their assertions. But, even admitting that they have gained all this—and it is a very large admission—it is permissible to ask, on the other hand, what they have lost.

In this connection, an article by Mr. Charles Ozanne in the Hibbert Journal for last October is much to the point. It is an attempt to prove the veracity of spirit communications, not by the ordinary evidential method of citing instances in which the medium has, while in the trance state, referred to events which he could not possibly have known, but by the non-evidential method of showing, by quotations from the records of the American Society of Psychical Research, how perfectly the messages thus received "correspond with what should reasonably be expected, and with what we know of life here." This is the kind of thing which satisfies the expectations of Mr. Charles Ozzanne, and purports to be genuine spirit utterances from "the other side."—"Difficulties in the way of successful communication are carefully studied." "Caution is used in the work, and new methods are experimented with in the effort to improve communications." "The trouble with this work is that so many get excited over the fact that they can communicate that they want to tell all they know at once, instead of thinking one word at a time." And we are asked to admire the following as the deliverance of trained minds which have been through "the greatest and most startling extension of the field of experience that they have ever known." "All in all I feel rather like the man at the ball in a football game. The interest is different, but the push and pull of mental energy is about the same." "We are far from the gloom of the grave, and I used to think sometimes that it was that human element in the communications which made the religious world balk at their acceptance. If the agonised cries of souls in Purgatory or triumphant strains of saints in Paradise had broken through the blue, the Church would have found its verification and been with us. But the members of the S.P.R. were neither saintly enough to get the Saints to descend nor devilish enough to communicate with the damned, and so there was nothing left but to talk with those whom they had known, just folks, plain folks."

It may be true, as the writer urges, that such messages could not be the fabrications of an ignorant medium. But it is equally plain that they are exactly the kind of thoughts which would be occupying the minds—conscious or subconscious—of the expectant gentlemen assembled to receive the communications; and, to the rank outsider, it seems highly probable that upon the blank, receptive mind of the medium is impressed, not a message from another life of larger knowledge and insight, but merely a crystallisation of the vague theories which are floating about in the brains of the group of able and benevolent investigators who surround her. In any case, we have no guarantee that these phenomena are not empty of all value and significance, scientific or spiritual, that they are not mere impressions left hovering in the atmosphere, and caught back again for a moment into visibility or audibility by the efforts of man:—phenomena from which it is as useless to try and construct any theory of Reality as it would be to argue the nature of a sound from the reverberations in the ear when it has ceased, or of sight from the image left upon the retina when the eye is closed.

Our present purpose, however, is not to offer any theory as to spiritualistic phenomena, but, taking them for the moment on trust as genuine communications from another world, to determine their spiritual value for man. I venture to think that the ordinary uninitiated reader of these messages will be fain to cry out, Tithonus-like, against so cruel an immortality: that he would prefer the darkness and extinction of the land where all things are forgotten to so weary and uninspiring a continuation of the earth-life, with its struggles and its failures, on the other side of death. But the fact that we do not like a thing is no argument against its truth. What can the non-spiritualist offer on the positive side for the illumination of the after-life? What precious thing does he possess which the spiritualists have had to abandon in their eager looking for that which eye has not seen, and their ceaseless listening for that which ear has not heard? Miss Underhill in her book on Mysticism has spoken of "the peculiar temper of mind, the cold intellectual arrogance, the intensely individual point of view which occult studies seem to induce by their conscious quest of exclusive power and knowledge, their implicit neglect of love." Here, perhaps, we may find the answer to our question. For it is at this point that the babes and sucklings enter into their heritage, and gain foothold in a spiritual kingdom into which the most earnest and devoted investigator, qua investigator, has forfeited his right of entry. It is not necessary to be a mystic in order to experience a sense of union with the unseen, and with those who have transcended the old unsatisfactory media of the earth-life, far more intense than any appeal to eye or ear or touch could possibly induce. To the simple, loving heart, which, under the guidance of love and the religious sense, has known such a union as this, "spiritualism" simply appears the most material thing it has ever come across. To insist upon clinging to the fetters of the senses when there is another and a higher mode of apprehension which it may dimly grasp, and in the full light of which its dear ones live, is a deliberate substitution of the lower for the higher: a dragging back into the soiled and dusty sphere of the material of that which should for ever have superseded it. Tennyson was not voicing any emotion beyond the reach—though doubtless beyond the expression—of the average man when he sang of his beloved dead:—

Strange friend, past, present, and to be;
Loved deeper, darklier understood;
Behold, I dream a dream of good,
And mingle all the world with thee.

My love involves the love before;
My love is vaster passion now;
Tho' mix'd with God and nature thou,
I seem to love thee more and more.

In vain the spiritualists may ask, Where is your proof? How do you know that you are not the victims of a pleasing delusion? The man who has never attempted the impossible task of apprehending Reality by the senses replies that he is content to walk by faith and not by sight: that, fleeting and elusive as his flashes of intuition may have been, he has known moments when he feels he cannot die,

And knows himself no vision to himself,
Nor the high God a vision.

No mere vulgar wonder-working can compel his allegiance. It has been won long ago by that revelation of the divine which speaks through the experience of humanity. "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

MAY MEETING MUSINGS.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES suggested that the story of Samson slaying a thousand men with the jawbone of an ass was commonly misinterpreted. It was evidently his idea that there was nothing miraculous about it; that it was, indeed, a commonplace transaction going on whenever an audience listened to a plausible but ill-informed speaker. Probably few of those who flock to the May meetings (which have now their genesis in April) will be in the least perturbed at this possibility, yet surely it would be dreadful to contemplate the Recording Angel, now rather old fashioned, taking verbatim reports of all the utterances! Much is written of the extraordinary amount of fiction which flows from English pens during the course of the year; it is a little strange that so few get in the least apprehensive about the volume of oratory which year by year, in season and out of season, assails the ears of long-suffering audiences. Yet the responsibility of the speaker can hardly be less than that of the writer. No doubt the newspaper is the most potent purveyor of opinions, but after the newspaper the public speaker, books being a bad third. Twenty people will listen to a speech to one who will read a book on the subject discussed, and it therefore becomes obvious that the speaker is in the position of a commander of ideas, he is the leader of backward minds into the forward line, and how important therefore it is that he should not pass bad intellectual coin on an easily gullible public like Professors Hankey and Pankey, the pillars of the Erewhonian faith in Samuel Butler's delightful book. Any statement made goes into the hearers' armoury of facts, and will be used to assail the Philistine in any future battle on this particular ground, and if ill chosen may return boomerang-like on the assailant to his discomfiture! W. H. Mallock, in "The New Republic," describes a dinner party at which a menu not only of what was available to go into the month but what was expected to come out of it was prepared, and on one side of it was a list of the dishes and on the other a programme of the topics of conversation! This might certainly be a warning to some of the guests to expect intellectual indigestion, and that we suspect is what many will suffer from at the numerous assemblies which offer tempting morsels for the speech taster during this month of May. For every man who listens to a speaker is surrounded by a shell, built round his mind, like the shell built by the nautilus, and composed of prejudices and pieces of information inadequately understood, and to pierce this shell is the hardest task of the man on the platform. If his mind were exactly attuned to the minds he was addressing how effectively it might play, but the differences between the minds of those he addresses is such that it must be like a violinist trying to tune his instrument into harmony with a thousand others. He has arrived at his position through various channels, through books, through personal experience, and through interchange of ideas with others; this mental pabulum has been open to very few, and he has to crystallise into about twenty minutes what may have taken him twenty years to discover. Is it surprising that sometimes he fails, and that the speaker who may be the ripest in knowledge may also be something of a bore?

Thanks to the progress of education, however, speakers are becoming more appreciated, and they in their turn are less capable of imposing upon an audience. We do not hear so much of those "wiry old Methuselahs," of stories about the eleventh-hour conversions of "infidels" and the wickedness of the "unbeliever" which were once so popular at May meetings, although Mrs. Bradlaugh Bonner has still occasionally to pursue and demolish some new fiction about her father.

Mark Rutherford has given a characteristic address in this strain in his "Revolution in Tanner's Lane." The Rev. Thomas Broad describes Voltaire as one "who on his death bed cried out in vain for that salvation which he had so impiously refused, and amidst shrieks of despair, which chilled with terror those who stood by him, was carried off by the Enemy of Souls to the lake that burneth with brimstone, where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched. (Sensation.)" Mark Rutherford adds that this was a famous paragraph in one of Mr. Broad's sermons preached on great occasions, and particularly when he supplied a metropolitan pulpit. The story had been contradicted twice in a local paper by a Frenchman, but Mr. Broad was content to observe that its author was a Frenchman, and therefore probably an atheist "with no consciousness of moral obligation." Truly did Lecky say that "Calumny is the homage which dogmatism has ever paid to conscience." Edmund Gosse, in his wonderful autobiography of childhood entitled "Father and Son," has a fine description of what was probably a genuine "May meeting." It was a conference, he says, and "the interminable ritual of prayers, hymns, and addresses left no impression on my memory, but my attention was suddenly stung into life by a remark. An elderly man, fat and greasy, with a voice like a bassoon and an imperturbable assurance, was denouncing the spread of infidelity, and the lukewarmness of professing Christians who refrained from battling the wickedness at their doors. They were like the Laodiceans, whom the Angel of the Apocalypse spewed out of his mouth. For instance, who, the orator asked, is now rising to check the outburst of idolatry in our midst? 'At this very moment,' he went on, 'there is proceeding, unproved, a blasphemous celebration of the birth of Shakespeare, a lost soul now suffering for his sins in Hell.'" To the comfort of the future critic Mr. Gosse, sen., afterwards expressed himself as hopeful, considering "that the light of salvation was widely disseminated in the land during the reign of Queen Elizabeth," that our national bard had, unknown to the world, found salvation before his death!

One thing perhaps will not occur to those who throng these annual gatherings, and that is how comparatively young is the privilege they enjoy. When we meet at election times, or to discuss some religious contention, we seldom recollect that it is not an ancient right. There were no large public meetings to decide the policy of the Parliamentary party in the Civil War, no demonstrations in favour of William of Orange at Tower Hill or Hyde Park! The first political public meeting was not held until 1769, and in 1795 a law was actually passed prohibiting public meetings from taking place unless five days' notice was inserted in a newspaper, giving the time, place, and object of the assembly, the notice had to be signed by householders, and the original notice preserved for the scrutiny of the justices of the peace. Moreover, when the meeting took place any single justice might disperse it if anything were said calculated to bring the Sovereign or Government into contempt, and the penalty of death could be inflicted if more than twelve persisted in remaining after such order had been given! The liberties of public meeting and free speech were hard to win, and they must be retained at all costs.

W. KENT.

THE BOOK SEALED.

THE late S. R. Crockett prefaced one of his stories by a parable of the buried life of man. The news of his passing hence at the age of fifty-three recalls the service in sweetening our outlook on life rendered by the Kailyard school. In days of pessimistic realism, when it was a fashion to paint life all in drabs and greys, Ian Maclaren, J. M. Barrie, and Crockett provided a powerful antidote in the shape of idealised commonplace which is the essence of romance. They furnished pictures of humble peasant life, and steeped them in the glamour of sentiment. They translated the pathos and humour of Burns into the story. We learnt to look at life through a window in Thrums, and caught gleam of eyes beneath a lilac sunbonnet, and listened to lovers' whispers beside the bonnie briar bush. And although James Douglas tried to cure us by presenting Scotch life without romance, as in the "House with the Green Shutters," the general reader has the incurable fault of preferring the light of Eden, even if it is false, to the truth shorn of the gleam. Life is too tangibly mean and sordid in many of its manifestations to permit censure of the artists who present the common human lot as it should be, clothed in poetic charm, etherealised and idealised.

And even then the picture falls short of the imaginative standard.

"There is a certain book of mine, which no publisher has paid royalty upon, which has never yet been confined in spidery lines upon any paper, a book that is, nevertheless, the Book of my youth, of my love, of my heart. In the chill of type there never will be such a book, for it would need the blood of rubies and the life of diamonds crusted on ivory to set the title alone.

"Mostly I see it in the late night-watches, when the twilight verges to the cock-crowing and the universe is silent, stirless, windless, for about the space of one hour. Then the pages of the book are opened a little; and as one that reads hungrily, hastily, at the bookstall of an impatient vendor a book he cannot buy, so I scan the idylls, the epics, the dramas of the life of man written in words which thrill me as I read. Some are fiercely tender, some yearning and unsatisfying, some bitter in the mouth but afterward sweet in the belly. All are expressed in words so fit and chaste and noble, that each is an immortal poem which would give me deathless fame—could I, alas! but remember. . . . Once more I have clutched, and missed, and forgotten. The imagination of my heart is left unto me desolate. And I who saw and heard, must go and sit down to my plain, saltless tale."

Every author has such an ideal book, the book that he has never written, the book that is finer than he can write. It is to such an ideal sermon the preacher sits down every week, but he rises from a desert strewn with platitudes. It is such a picture the artist ever hopes and ever despairs to paint, and his canvases bear witness how he fails. Even the voiceless have their book sealed. The last thing to which the average man would confess is the wicket gate that leads into the wild woods where the fairies hold court. A young poet has died in the heart of every man of forty, it is said. Yet he comes to life every spring and at odd moments when—

. . . . There's a sunset touch,

A fancy from a flower-bell, someone's death,

A chorus-ending from Euripides

To rap and knock and enter in our soul.

Every business man fettered to the grindstone has his alter ego camping on the prairies and fishing in distant streams. Every childless woman has in the world of dreams a child of adorable grace, who is her own bonnie wee mannie or girlie. Every ugly crooked man has the imperishable desire of being beloved by an altogether beautiful woman. Who would care to bring up to the light the foolish ambition that will not die, but in this life will never effectuate itself? Why should the victim of a halting utterance glow beneath the vision of holding a crowd enthralled by his tumultuous eloquence? Why should the clumsy-fingered imagine himself playing a violin or piano concerto buoyed up as by a rising tide of melodious waters? Without the slightest artistic deftness, a churl will permit fancies of his picture, his sculpture, his architectural fane, the cynosure of admiring multitudes.

Where does the narrow soul harbour his hosts of angels? The psychological justification relates to what the late Professor Wm. James, of Harvard, claimed to be the greatest discovery made within the last hundred years in the realm of mind. It is the demonstration that human consciousness is only a part of man's whole self; that all we are does not come within the mind's range of activity; that "there is actually and literally more life in our total soul than we are at any time aware of." The humped camel of our more extensive being cannot pass through the needle's eye of the brain. There are bonded stores that never suffer exchange over the counter. Our atmosphere holds in solution more moisture than falls in the daily showers. In reserve, in abeyance may lie the poet and the orator. We all have resources upon which we have never drawn. With what result? With the result that we have a thousand reasons the Reason never knows; that we have moods, longings, ideals which nothing in our common daily life may justify.

For still, from time to time, vague and forlorn,

From the soul's subterranean depth upborne,

As from an infinitely distant land,
Come airs and floating echoes, and convey

A melancholy unto all our day.

Who knows what shrine is hidden in a turn of the mountain road in the estate of the vilest? How may we judge by fragmentary revelations the unplumbed depths of the total being? And in dealing with ourselves, the hardest portion of fate's allotment, have we not to remember in face of our despairing limitations the uncharted domain beyond our ken? Perchance what is but faith here is clear assurance there; what is but instinct here, is memory there; what is but intuition here is there knowledge face to face; and what is but perplexity here is that total understanding there, and total acceptance and acquiescence.

And in the wood beyond the edge of the world perchance our chained powers, having slipped the leash, have pursued and captured the White Hart with the antlers of gold, and the sound we heard a moment ago is the herald of the victor's return.

HOSPITALITY IN WHIT-WEEK.

SIR,—A considerable number of ministers have intimated that they purpose attending the Anniversary Meetings in London in Whit-week, and many of them are applying for hospitality. Mrs. Herbert-Smith, on behalf of the Women's League, has very kindly obtained offers from hostesses; but there are still several ministers unprovided for. It is possible that this letter may reach the eye of some hostess in or near London who may not otherwise be aware of the need, in which case I shall be greatly obliged if she will communicate with me at Essex Hall.

May I add that in the course of another week, tickets for the Essex Hall Lecture and for the Conversazione will be forwarded to all ministers and delegates whose names have reached the office? Members of the Association who desire to attend the Lecture by the Dean of St. Paul's on Wednesday forenoon, June 3, should send a halfpenny-stamped and addressed envelope to the Secretary, Essex Hall, not later than May 25, after which date non-members and the general public may obtain tickets in the order of application.—Yours, &c.,

VICTORIAN LITERATURE.

Outlines of Victorian Literature. By Hugh Walker, LL.D., and Mrs. Hugh Walker. Cambridge, at the University Press. 3s. net.

WHATEVER influences may have predominated in the literatures of other times, it will hardly be denied that the influence of religion can be most clearly traced in the great Victorian writings. In their "Outlines of Victorian Literature," Professor Hugh Walker and Mrs. Hugh Walker have attempted to depict the authors of the period "not merely as writers, but as men" (see Preface), and the biographical element thus introduced yields a vividness of presentment which is too often absent from literary surveys of the kind. Readers of Professor Walker's exhaustive and brilliant work, "The Literature of the Victorian Era" (1910), on which the present book is based, will recall the unusual amount of attention therein given to philosophical and theological tendencies, as these are reflected in both the prose writers and the poets of the time. The same recognition of speculative aspects is to be found in the smaller work, and any loss of detailed treatment now observable is more than compensated by a greater concentration upon outstanding personalities and movements.

Starting with the introduction of the German spirit into England, our authors give a particularly graphic and well-balanced account of Thomas Carlyle. "No one else," they contend, "did so much to make the literature of his age what it became," since it was he, more than any man, who "naturalised German thought in England." There are some brief but wise allusions to the Carlyle marriage controversy, which certain deciders of the great Chelsea teacher would do well to ponder, while the real force of the Carlylean message is brought out with admirable clearness in a passage which must be quoted in its entirety: "Carlyle's profound belief in strength, as symbolised for him by men like Cromwell and Frederick, has alienated many.

They do not see that the terms 'might' and 'right,' in his use of them are interchangeable. If we give them centuries to try it in, Carlyle holds that we may say indifferently 'might is right' or 'right is might.' The universe is just, and, in the long run, right is bound to triumph. But the triumph must be won by effort. Carlyle kept always before his eyes the need of fighting for justice and truth. These were the chief articles of his faith."

In addition to the Carlyle sketch, the earlier pages of the volume contain some illuminating notes on various theologians, philosophers, and scientists of the period. Dr. Chalmers and John Henry Newman are the chief theologians treated; the first-named "deserves to be remembered for the things he did, rather than for the books he wrote," while the Oxford leader has long been an acknowledged literary genius. It is affirmed that the refinement and strength which we associate with Newman's style must be regarded as attributes of his character also. A theologian of mediæval type, and anti-German to the core, he set himself from the first vehemently to withstand the spread of liberal ideas. In the section devoted to philosophers are to be found some noteworthy remarks on John Stuart Mill, T. H. Green, Edward Caird, and Dr. Martineau. Mills' beauty of character and his zeal for civic liberty are accentuated. Though, on the literary side, he produced in his "System of Logic" a work of far-reaching influence, Mill throughout showed himself impervious to that idea of evolution which was the dominant thought of his century; he wrote as if that idea did not exist. The two Hegelians, Green and Caird, adopted widely different methods of teaching; Green strove to illustrate his point by criticising some philosopher (e.g., Hume) whose thought was at variance with his own, while Caird aimed rather at developing his thesis through the exhibition of similarities between himself and another. Of Caird it is asserted that "he made no converts by violence, but probably no man who understood his lectures failed to be permanently influenced by him." Readers of THE INQUIRER will appreciate the sympathetic allusions, in this same philosophical section, to Dr. Martineau and his writings; not only are Martineau's books specified as establishing him in the front rank, but it is further maintained that "he has a claim for remembrance in his high-mindedness, and in the simple integrity of his life." In the account of scientific leaders, due homage is paid to Herbert Spencer, Darwin, and Huxley. The greatness of his conception of his task marks Spencer as a wonderful man, whatever the limits of his actual achievement. Darwin, the greatest biologist of his age, was not naturally gifted as regards literary expression, but through immense effort he eventually attained, in a wonderful degree, the power of simple attractive narration, Huxley supplemented Darwin on the anatomical side, and was, moreover, the "gladiator-general of science"—using his brilliant powers as an essayist to interpret life and to criticise old theories in the light of modern science.

Coming to the chapter on poetry, we find it mainly concerned, of course, with Tennyson and Browning. It is to these real masters of song that we turn for the poetical expression of nineteenth century religious feeling, rather than to the hymn-writers and nominally religious poets; for, as it is shrewdly observed, "though the spirit of our highest poetry is essentially religious, in our religious verse we do not find the highest poetry." In the very interesting account of Tennyson there are some suggestive remarks upon the vexed question of "The Idylls"; the poet has been censured for borrowing so much from the "Mabinogion" and from Malory's "Morte d'Arthur," but this blame is not just, seeing that "these great stories of romance... are the poetical inheritance of the world," and "have a different message for each generation"; it is "the privilege of new poets to express the message in the language of their times. . . . Shakespeare acted on the same principle as Tennyson, and so did the great Greek tragedians." The excellences of Tennyson are most apparent in his shorter poems, though "In Memoriam" (to name one of his longer ventures) is full of word-jewels and makes an almost universal appeal in the religious sense; never a convert to the strictly realistic method, in old age he "came into much closer contact with the workaday world than in the beginning of his career." Robert Browning's poetical maturity was reached almost at a bound, when, at the age of twenty-three, he issued "Paracelsus"; in later years he never wrote anything more full of genius than this poem with its splendours of thought and diction, while its two principles of love and knowledge (love being given the priority) are the principles that run through the whole of his work. According to our authors it is in "Rabbi Ben Ezra" that the poet most clearly expresses his faith; he wishes us to see that "the purest religion is of any creed or none." As a playwright, Browning was not very successful, but in "dramatic monologue" he discovered a literary form peculiarly adapted to his genius. Among minor poets, Clough and Matthew Arnold are noticed as giving utterance to that vague religious yearning, which, in a particular atmosphere of doubt and questioning, prevailed about the middle of the century.

Conditions of space prevent more than the barest allusion to those later sections of the book which deal with distinguished novel-writers, historians, biographers, and critics. Scattered among the many admirable expositions of individual authors will be found some striking comments on literature in general; to one of these attention may be drawn in concluding this brief notice of a very stimulating volume. Pointing to what certain women novelists of this country have achieved, our authors declare that in no other sphere of literature do women reach the highest place; "there has never been a female Shakespeare, but the famous French critic Scherer finds George Eliot the first of English novelists, and he is not alone in this judgment."

AGAINST ALCOHOL.

THE popular edition of Mr. Guy Hayler's book on "Prohibition Advance in All Lands" (International Prohibition Confederation, 133, Salisbury-square, E.C., price 1s. 6d.), should be added to the working library of all social reformers. They may or may not agree with the policy of total prohibition of trade in alcoholic drinks, but they cannot fail to learn here many facts as to the state of things now existing in the principal countries of the world, or to meet with many valuable suggestions arising from the record of various temperance efforts. The book is not free from misprints, and perhaps a keen critic might detect statistical errors here and there; but it bears evidence of a genuine effort to gather into focus a world-wide movement the importance of which can hardly be over-rated. We can only mention here two or three of its more striking revelations. The progress of total prohibition is greatest, oddly enough, in some of the countries where one might expect more indulgence in "nips to keep out the cold," e.g., Iceland, Greenland, and the Faroe Islands; and Denmark is advancing toward the same line as her dependencies. Again, in Norway, Sweden, and Finland, the tendency is equally evident towards a stringent policy—not forced upon the people by grandmotherly rulers, but often more vigorous in popular demand than in legislative action. A noteworthy resolution was carried in the Russian Duma last year. As readers probably know, the trade in vodka, the national alcoholic drink, is a government monopoly in Russia—a position which was no doubt set up, not merely to secure lucrative profits, but in order to combat the worst evils of intemperance; but it has been attended, evidently, with very deplorable results. The Duma resolved that the following label should be placed on all vodka bottles: "Man! Although thou hast bought this spirit, yet know that thou drinkest poison which destroys thee. Before it is too late, never buy another bottle. (Signed) Minister of Finance." The Reichsrath—is it strange to say?—over-ruled this proposal, but at last, for very shame, it agreed to remove the arms of the Empire from the labels. Another singular symptom is the boycott of spirits set up from time to time by the Socialists on the Continent, notably in Germany, Austria, and Belgium. How effectual this boycott can be is shown by the fact that in Germany, in five months of 1909-10 the consumption of "Schnapps" fell off by over 31 per cent. That this step was taken merely to embarrass the Exchequer certainly does not lessen its significance; but the very notable fact has to be added, that many of the workmen having for political reasons learned to abstain, continue to abstain for reasons of the better health and welfare generally that resulted from the practice. Last year the Belgian strike, which was practically a general one, was remarkable for the absence of rioting, due to its being a "teetotal" strike of this kind. The condition of affairs in France is an anxious one in many ways, and not least in regard to the enormous increase of alcoholic drinking that has taken place in recent years, with the inevitable result of increased disease and crime. Our space will not permit of further illustration, we can only commend the work to the careful attention of all good citizens. They simply cannot afford to be indifferent to the appalling evils due to intoxicating drinks, or to the sinister power in the State wielded by those who profit by them.

W. G. T.

THE Duke Litta, whose new novel, "Mon-signor Villarosa," we noticed last week, is a man of keen social sympathies, though his efforts to put certain ideals into practice have not always had the most fortunate results. He is, according to M. A. B., the last member of a historical Lombard family, and some fifteen years ago, after prolonged travels abroad, in the course of which he had frequent intercourse with Bebel and von Wolman and others of German Socialism, he settled down in the ancient castle of his ancestors with the intention of putting his creed of Socialism into practice. He accordingly withdrew all the large estate round his castle from its former tenants and gave it up for cultivation to 137 families of his peasants. At first the experiment gave excellent results, and the economic condition of the labourers improved greatly; but the experiment came to complete failure through, it is said, the influence of the Socialist leaders, who induced the peasants to claim ownership and refuse to work. The Duke was much affected, and acknowledged that his dream had vanished, being persuaded that the peasants' ignorance still made collectivism impossible. What is his present attitude to the agrarian agitation can be seen clearly from the present book.

ANOTHER book by Dr. Hugo Münsterberg, whose "Psychology and Crime" appeared last year, has just been published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, under the title "Psychology and Social Sanity." Dr. Münsterberg, who was born at Dantzic in 1863, was educated at the Dantzic Gymnasium and at the Universities of Leipzig and Heidelberg. He was then appointed to an assistant professorship at Freiburg, but in 1892 he crossed the Atlantic to take up the duties of Professor of Psychology and Director of the Psychological Laboratory at Harvard University, positions which he still holds.

THE PARTHENON AT ATHENS.

IV.—THE STORY OF THE BIRTH OF WISDOM.

STORY-TELLING was one of the great gifts possessed by the people of ancient Greece. Nearly all the fairy stories that we love so well had their origin among the people of that far-off time. Even "Jack the Giant-killer" may be traced back to Hermes and his combat with the dragon, and all of our wonder tales have, at any rate, a family connection with the myths of pagan days.

It is to one of these ancient stories that the broken statues of the Parthenon belong. In our day we should scarcely imagine that great art would be used for the purpose of illustrating the stories of the nursery ; but that is because those stories have lost their meaning. In ancient Greece, however, it was different, for the stories were invented in order to illustrate the greatest and highest truths known. If you will remember that Zeus and Athena were the chief figures represented in the Parthenon carvings, you will see how they fit into the following story.

Long, long ago, when men had scarcely learnt how to be wiser than the animals of the field, Zeus, the greatest of gods, was not well. As he sat upon his throne among the clouds a heaviness was upon his brow, for he was worried and in pain. He had a very severe headache, and came to the conclusion that his trouble was due to the fact that his head was too full of wisdom. None of it was shared by the creatures of his universe. Brooding over the situation, he saw that if he could be relieved of some of it his creatures would become a noble race, for they would be sharers of his wisdom and grow out of animal propensities into a divine humanity. So he resolved to devise means whereby his great wisdom should be shared. But he had difficulty in knowing how the operation could be accomplished. We smile as we think of the realistic simplicity of the ancient Greeks in imagining the details of this story. To-day we would never dream of thinking God had anything like a headache. Yet we cannot but admit that the idea was very expressive. Of course, if God is the origin of all things, he alone would be possessed of all the wisdom of the universe before it was given to man ; but we would scarcely be bold enough to carry our thought so far as to imagine all that wisdom reposing within God's head. We know now that we can only think of God having a head like human beings as a figure of speech.

The story went on to say that Zeus bethought him of the god Vulcan, who had performed many deeds for him, for he was skilled in all kinds of craftsmanship, and, among other things, knew well how to use the axe and hammer. Being the greatest of all gods, Zeus could command the services of all the lesser gods, and accordingly he sent for Vulcan and asked him to open his forehead and so liberate wisdom. Needless to say, Vulcan did not like the task set him to do ; but he had to obey. And the Greeks tell that Vulcan aimed an accurate and steady blow at the head of Zeus, and that when the opening was made Athena came out, fully grown and completely armed. Wisdom was in that way born to the world, according to Greek mythology. And that is why the Greeks called Athena the goddess of wisdom, and erected the great temples like the Parthenon in honour of their wonderful patroness of all wise things.

If ever you are at an exhibition of ancient Greek vases, look out for a quaint design illustrating this strange story. It was frequently painted on the red vases with black figures, touched up with lines of white. Zeus will be seen seated upon his throne, with a woman's head and body emerging from the top of his head. And in front of him will be seen a powerful, bearded figure with an adze in his raised hand. You will then know how the ancient Greeks pictured the coming of wisdom into the world.

A group of figures similar in design to this once stood in the central place of the Parthenon pediment, about which we were thinking in our last talk. But the marble statues are now lost, and we have no copy of them. We can only conclude that they were placed somewhat like the figures on the red vases, which you may find in the British Museum.

It seems very strange, and not altogether pleasing, to think of blows being aimed at the great god. We can scarcely regard them as blows of anger or any kind of viciousness ; for they were invited by Zeus himself. If we think of them as part of Vulcan's ordinary occupation, we are not so surprised, for then they just mean that the great God had asked Vulcan to direct his activities towards the highest he would know. Vulcan would usually be employed making shields and armour ; and we can imagine that he would mostly do this work with no further thought than that of engaging in his daily tasks. But Zeus here tells him to think of the highest god in his efforts ; and when he does so he produces wisdom. That is the thought the whole of this strange myth was worked out to emphasise. Wisdom comes to the world when our activities are directed towards God. It is so easy to go through life, doing our daily tasks without a thought of God. We have to perform those tasks and meet often discouragements and disappointments, and we usually think of them simply as bothers which hinder our doing what we would like to do. If, instead of acting in this way, we were to consider them in the light of God, we should become wise. That is the lesson the Greeks taught the world when they invented this story of the Birth of Athena. The story was first told in the very early days of Greek civilisation, and was treasured by them all through the ages of development, right on to the days of the higher Greek glory. We may think it crude and perhaps repulsive, but it satisfied them always as representing the only way the world achieves wisdom, namely, by directing all efforts not merely for the immediate purpose at hand, but towards God : in everything that we are called upon to do, to try to find God.

LUCKING TAVENER.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. RUPERT POTTER.

It is with sincere regret that we chronicle the death of Mr. Rupert Potter at the advanced age of 81 years. From 1848 to 1851 he was a lay student of Manchester New College, then established in Manchester, graduating B.A. in the latter year in the University of London, and coming under the influence of the Rev. John James Tayler and Dr. Martineau, then on its teaching staff. He also attended Mr. Tayler's ministry at the Upper Brook-street Free Church, Manchester, and his own attachment to our church life owed much to that early experience, while, as one of the family of Mr. Edmund Potter, of Dinting, Glossop, he was connected with Hyde Chapel, under the ministry of the Rev. Charles Beard. On being called to the Bar, and settling in London, he found his Alma Mater removed there to its new home at University Hall in 1853 ; and it is in the memory of students of Manchester New College, during its tenancy in the Hall, how regularly he kept in touch with it by attending at its debates, and what an earnest part he took in them, speaking with a fluency all his own. He became once more an attendant in Mr. Tayler's services during his joint ministry with Dr. Martineau at Little Portland-street Chapel, retaining to the end close association with it, and being a generous subscriber to its funds and those of the Portland Schools. In later years he was a devoted member of Essex Church. He, at the same time, never severed his early ties with the North County of his birth, which were renewed and strengthened by his marriage to a daughter of Mr. John Leech, of Staly-bridge. He was a contributor to the funds of the Glossop Chapel, built by his father, and a constant supporter of the Stalybridge Chapel and Schools.

A man of leisure, he used his leisure well. One of his favourite occupations was photography, and in this he attained rare excellence. Proofs of it are to be found in the portraits he took. When John Bright and the Rev. William Gaskell used to share his hospitality in the Highlands, and to fish in his salmon river, he made use of the opportunity, and obtained about the very best likenesses of them extant. Moreover, he executed photographic reproductions of many pictures of Sir John Millais (a personal friend and guest of his also in the Highlands), which appear in his son's biography. They are splendidly done with great labour and care. He was well known to some of the first men of the day as their kind host, or at the Reform Club, of which he was one of the oldest members. There was indeed in him much of what constitutes a true Christian gentleman, with the culture and refinement the words convey. His artistic nature, which in him took form in the beauty of his photographic art, is inherited by his daughter, Mrs. Heelis, best known as Beatrix Potter, whose charming animal books are the delight of untold thousands of children. The funeral took place, on Tuesday at Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross.

MR. JOSEPH HANCOCK FORRESTER, J.P.

WE regret to record the death on the 5th inst. at his residence, 51, Charlotte-road, Edgbaston, Birmingham, of Mr. J. H. Forrester, J.P., a life-long member of the Old Meeting Church, in whose Sunday school he had received a large part of his early education, and where he had acted for several years as senior warden, and for many years as trustee and member of the church committee. He was an ex-Chairman of the Birmingham Board of Guardians, on which he was first elected in 1884; a co-opted member of the Education Committee of the city; a Justice of the Peace; and was active in numerous offices of philanthropy and mercy. He was also for more than forty years a member of the National Independent Order of Oddfellows, becoming Grand Master in 1881-2, and presiding at the annual meeting which was held at Scarborough that year.

In the unavoidable absence of the minister, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, the Rev. H. H. Johnson, formerly minister of Waverley-road Church, Small Heath, Birmingham, and an intimate friend of the deceased, conducted the service on Saturday, the 9th inst., at the Old Meeting Church. In the course of his address to a large congregation of friends and representatives of Birmingham's public life, he remarked: "Few of your public-minded citizens—and Birmingham can have a legitimate pride in having produced a great number, to whom the Old Meeting Church and the Church of the Messiah have contributed a considerable proportion—could have been more prodigal of themselves in good works than was he. He was one of the worthiest men in your city—a quiet, persistent force in all that tended toward civic righteousness. If I were to try to estimate his character I should say that his dominant characteristics were—a most warm heart, a natural good cheer, a sterling veracity, a shrewd common sense, and a never-wearying endeavour to do all the good he could in all possible ways. The last day of his life—aged 75—was typical. In the morning he sat on the Bench at Selly Oak, in the afternoon and early evening he devoted himself to his business; and at 8 p.m. he attended a meeting at St. Luke's Church in connection with his work on the Birmingham Education Committee, having a sudden and fatal seizure shortly after his return home. He died, as he would have wished, in harness. He bids us follow him, to be as worthy citizens as he, and, whether success or failure attend us, to march on breast forward in the sure and certain hope that the souls of the righteous are in the hands of God and that their reward is sure." The interment took place at the Key Hill Cemetery.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

HOPE STREET CHURCH, LIVERPOOL

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

WHEN one revisits scenes after the lapse of long years, and the occasion is of a nature to quicken the emotions, it is natural that there should be a stir of old memories. So it was with the writer last Sunday morning. As the organ pealed, and a congregation of new worshippers assembled, he looked round at the familiar walls, and as his gaze rested on the still empty pulpit it seemed to be occupied by former tenants. There was the genial Charles Wicksteed, smiling blandly through his spectacles. Only one sentence of his many sermons remains in the memory (it was prior to the days of the Higher Criticism). He was speaking of the sin against the Holy Ghost, "which shall not be forgiven of men neither in this world nor in that which is to come." "But," said the preacher, "what of the world after?" It was the originality of this remark which, I suppose, fixed it in the memory. Then came the Rev. E. M. Geldart, whom the congregation took directly from his curacy in the Church of England. One Sunday morning a tall, distinguished looking gentleman, whom no one seemed to know, after morning service expressed a desire to be introduced to the preacher. He proved to be the Rev. E. Everett Hale, of Boston. Among the occasional occupants was the Rev. Robert Collyer. "Now let us all sing this hymn together," said he at the close of his discourse. But, alas for his Methodist fervour! The tune selected was far beyond the reach of any but the choir seated in the organ gallery at the end of the building, so the look of eager fervour gave place to one of abandoned hope. The Revs. R. Suffield and C. Voysey both preached here soon after their secession from their respective communions, and it was from this pulpit that the Rev. C. Bears preached at the first aggregate Sunday School service. Dr. Martineau, who was the first incumbent, we never heard from this pulpit, but he made a remarkable speech in the school-room adjoining. Said the editor of a weekly Liverpool paper to the writer: "Can you follow him? I can't. He seems to begin thinking where others leave off." The other guest on this occasion was a Church of England minister from Cheshire. He made a short speech, and then sat down, explaining that he felt overweighted. "But I can crow on my own dunghill," he added. The subsequent history of the church we know only by report. It included the short but tender ministry of the Rev. C. Perry, and the longer brilliant one of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. The building itself is unchanged, the only thing to denote the lapse of time being the tablets on the walls, including three marble ones to the memory of Dr. Martineau, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and H. W. Meade-King, who have all passed away during the present century.

Now we are present to welcome one of another generation, and perhaps of another order of thought. The spirit remains the same, but the form changes, as he was shortly to say in a sermon of striking eloquence and fervour. The Rev. Stanley A. Mellor bears a name long familiar in the ministry, and he himself promises to add lustre to it. To readers of THE INQUIRER he is already well known. After a distinguished student's career he settled at Rotherham, and from thence was called to Warrington, where his ministry has apparently been all too short for the congregation there. But their loss is likely to be Liverpool's gain. Speaking from the text, "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty," Dr. Mellor reminded his hearers of the noble foundation of their Church. Faith in freedom, freedom in faith; and that faith involved a great responsibility. They must be true to the spirit of religion, and that could only be secured by constant living communion with God. Their freedom must be threefold: freedom of the mind, freedom of the soul, freedom from self. Unless self was conquered life was a prison-house, and God could not dwell where base desires and low ambitions had place. Emancipate the self, and existence became changed from dulness to romance; from monotony to adventure; from struggle to daring endeavour with God, and the hierarchy of heaven as witnesses. These are only a few of many striking passages in a sermon which we venture to say promises a fruitful ministry. There were too few young people in the church, but Dr. Mellor will, we think, be able to appeal to these, who, while no less earnest than their forefathers, look on the problems of life with different eyes.

There was a full choir, the singing compared favourably with forty years ago, and at the close of the sermon the anthem, "The Peace of Jerusalem," was beautifully rendered.

WESTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN CHURCHES.

ANNUAL MEETINGS AT ILMINSTER.

THE annual assembly of the Western Union of Unitarian Churches was held at Ilminster on Thursday, May 7, when delegates from all parts of the wide area covered by the Union, extending from Plymouth to Cheltenham, Gloucester, Trowbridge and Bridport, were present. The day's proceedings began with a service in the Old Meeting Chapel conducted by the Rev. E. Stanley Russell. About a hundred delegates and friends attended the luncheon, at which Colonel M. Locke Blake, J.P., C.C., presided. The toast, "Success to the Western Union," having been proposed by the Chairman, and responded to by the Rev. J. McDowell, the Mayor of Wells, Mr. G. W. Wheeler, submitted the toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty." In the course of his speech he made special reference to the great unrest in the civil and religious life of the present time, and to the set-back given by the Kikuyu controversy to the tendency towards a broader Christianity. The Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, of Bath, in responding, said he trusted that they would esteem civil and religious liberty so highly that they would put into practice their professions, and be always on the side of the oppressed and of those who had few or no chances to make the best of themselves. The business meeting was held in the afternoon, Mr. C. Harold Goodland presiding. The Chairman congratulated the congregation upon the renovation of the chapel and the installation of the new organ. Much sympathy was expressed for the Rev. H. Austin in the sad loss he had sustained by the death of his son, the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, also regret at the departure from their midst of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, whose generosity they would always remember with gratitude. The Rev. Rudolf Davis, the secretary and district minister, presented the 68th annual report, which recorded the gratifying fact that the response to the appeal for special donations to meet a deficit on the previous year's accounts had been instant and generous, and before the date of the annual assembly a sum of £65 was received, more than enough to ensure the payment in full of all grants to aided churches. During the year the President had visited and conducted service in most of the aided and some of the unaided churches, and this had been found helpful by the various congregations. The financial statement, also presented by the secretary in the absence of Mr. J. Kenrick Champion (hon. treasurer), showed a balance on the year's workings of £5 18s. 4d. The adoption of the reports, moved by the Chairman and seconded by Mr. Henry Lupton, of Torquay, was carried. A resolution recommending the grants to be made for the present year was proposed by the Rev. Dr. Beckh, of Clifton, seconded by Mr. J. Y. Wakeham, Plymouth, and carried. Other resolutions thanking the officers and committee for their work, and re-appointing the Advisory Committee, were also carried, and an invitation was given to the Assembly to visit Trowbridge next year by Mr. F. A. Bullock.

At the evening meeting, when Mr. Harold Goodland presided over a large attendance in the chapel, the Rev. Stanley E. Russell was thanked for his sermon, and a welcome was given to Mr. G. H. Leigh, J.P., C.C., the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. Goodland thanked the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for the great help it gave them, and also the Rev. J. Harwood for the zealous efforts he had made on behalf of the £50,000 sustentation fund. Referring to Sunday school work, he said he realised that their Unitarian movement, with its disavowal of an authoritative creed, and its adherence to the principle of free inquiry, had been able to adapt itself to changing phases of thought, and to assimilate new ideas from generation to generation; but he knew full well that there were a great many adherents to their congregations who could not explain the principles of their faith, and that a large number of young people who grew up in connection with their churches and Sunday schools had no very clear idea of what Unitarianism was. They wanted the young people to become so imbued with the spirit of their faith that they would realise it was something worth striving for, that the principles of truth for authority (not authority for truth), reason, and conscience, the guides of truth and conduct; freedom of thought and speech, indispensable to the discovery of truth; perfection of character, the purpose of existence—that these principles formed the basis of their Unitarian faith, and were not to be found in any other ecclesiastical communion. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford seconded the resolution. For the last forty-eight years, he said, he had been in the fighting line, and it was a glorious thing to come face to face with people and bear personal testimony for one's faith. They sometimes thought they were going on rapidly to success, but there was still much opposition and prejudice to overcome. He believed, however, that the old spirit of antagonism was passing away, and that truth and justice would ultimately prevail. The Rev. Stanley Russell said that the world to-day did not want a religion of consolation, but one of appreciation. The world was tired of being consoled, and men no longer believed that it was a sad thing to be alive, and that the human heart was naturally depraved and wicked. The world, which was often spoken of so slightly, was full of the divine, and if they were going outside it to find the Church they were going outside God. God was caring wonderfully for the world, and one day they would have all realised that "to be alive and be yourself" was to be one with the Lord. Mr. G. H. Leigh said the chapel in which they were assembled had associations for him of a peculiarly tender character, and he congratulated the Ilminster congregation most heartily upon the improvements which had been undertaken to make it more beautiful. There were in Great Britain and Ireland from 360 to 370 congregations of their Church, one-half of which were established over 200 years ago. If there should be any differences between the old churches and those of more modern growth they must be put aside, and the common cause upheld by consolidating their position and making it more capable of the higher ideals which they all entertained with regard to their church life and interest.

The Rev. J. Harwood also spoke briefly, and a hearty vote of thanks to the Minister, committee, and congregation of the Old Meeting was proposed by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, of Exeter, which was seconded by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Plymouth, and carried unanimously, Mr. W. Harvey Blake and the Rev. W. Holmshaw replying on behalf of the congregation.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE thirteenth annual meeting of the Union was held in Manchester on Saturday, April 25. Divine service was held in Cross-street Chapel at 3.0 p.m. The preacher was the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Birmingham. At 4 o'clock the annual business meeting was held at the Lower Mosley-street Schools, the President, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, being in the chair.

There were also present Mr. H. P. Greg, M.A., treasurer; the Revs. Dendy Agate, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, W. G. Price, E. Thackray, E. L. H. Thomas, L. Short, J. H. Short, J. Ellis, F. Coleman, M. Rowe, H. R. Tavener, G. A. Ferguson, Chas. Smith, and H. Fisher Short, secretary, and representatives of the various guilds.

The Secretary read the Council's report, which extended a hearty welcome to the following Guilds, which have joined the Union since the last annual meeting: (Seniors), Coseley, Park-lane, Dudley, Walsall, Tamworth, Handsworth, Leigh and Hunslet; (Juniors), Uppertorpe, Park-lane, Blackpool (North Shore), Astley and Preston. It congratulated the recently formed Midland Guilds' Union, under the presidency of the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and expressed its appreciation of the efforts of Miss Twist, to whom the inauguration was largely due. Miss Twist had also helped to secure a wide circulation among the Guilds of their new magazine Church, School and Home, to whose editor, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and secretary, Mr. Lewis Lloyd, thanks were returned for a liberal allowance of space for Guild news and articles. Unfortunately the prize Essay scheme had secured but a small response. The work had been divided into junior and senior sections, and in all only four essays had been sent in. The Rev. John Ellis had examined the junior papers on "The Life and Moral Teaching of James Martineau," and his awards were:—First prize (10s.), Miss M. J. Hodgkins, Walsall; second prize (5s.), Miss F. Smith, Uppertorpe. The senior papers on "The Christian Ideal," were adjudicated by the Rev. Mortimer Rowe, B.A., who divided the second prize (10s.) between Miss M. M. Melland, Hole, and Mr. F. J. Green, Leigh.

The report concluded as follows:—"We are living in critical times, and no church can afford to neglect any real means for the accomplishment of its best aims. Most earnestly, therefore, would we recommend to all our Free Churches the necessity of utilising the far-reaching advantages of the Guild. If only we can win the hearts of our young people for God and the good life, our churches will be richly blessed, and our future big with promise."

The statement of accounts was presented by the Treasurer, who reported that though the expenditure for the year was high—especially in respect of postages—there was a small balance in hand. A letter was read from the Rev. J. J. Wright, vice-president, who is trying to regain his health at Harrogate, and the meeting resolved to send a message of sympathy to him, with best wishes for his speedy recovery. The following officials were elected:—President, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle; vice-presidents, the Revs. J. J. Wright and J. M. Lloyd Thomas; treasurer, Mr. H. P. Greg, M.A.; secretary, the Rev. H. Fisher Short. Council, Miss M. Twist, Miss A. Short, Messrs. R. M. Entwistle and H. Whitaker; the Revs. Neander Anderton, Dr. E. Thackray, Mortimer Rowe, Frank Coleman, John Ellis, E. Morgan, J. Arthur Pearson and W. G. Price.

In the evening the annual young people's rally was held in the large school-room. Thoughtful and stimulating addresses were given by Mrs. H. Fisher Short, Mr. John Dendy, and the Rev. Mortimer Rowe, interspersed with musical items by Miss Ada Short, Miss Lily Smalley, and Mr. John E. Rhodes, Mr. Geo. Gorton acting as accompanist. On the motion of the Rev. Dendy Agate, seconded by the Rev. W. G. Price, the meeting expressed its gratitude to all who had contributed to the programme.

THE ALLIANCE OF HONOUR.

A GREAT assemblage of some 7,000 men well filling the Royal Albert Hall, took place on April 30 in celebration of the eleventh anniversary of the Alliance of Honour. The Society was founded in 1903 to induce men of England to hold aloft, despite the powerful temptations by which they were surrounded, the nobility and honour of a life unsullied by impurity; and consequently, to maintain a chivalrous regard for the virtue of woman. The vast audience, the larger proportion being members of the Association, gathered from many parts of the country, and it was known that friends just arrived from Barbadoes, British Honduras, and Russia, were present. The question of purity, declared Lord Balfour of Burleigh, who presided, concerned the best interests of the home, the nation, and the Church, and the same standard or morals should be applicable to men and women alike.

Apart altogether from the presentation of a very cheering report of the year's progress, an announcement of deep significance was made, no less than "An All-round-England Purity Campaign," to commence in the autumn of 1915. The project will occupy several years, and it is estimated that the initial cost will be £25,000. During the first session of the actual campaign 800 mass meetings will be planned for the large cities and towns of the country. The following session will be devoted to gatherings in the smaller towns, succeeded by a large series in towns of still less magnitude, the whole being concluded by a "caravan campaign" to reach the outlying districts. It was mentioned that the Archbishop of York hopes to take some part in this projected campaign, and that the Bishop of London, who has already spoken at Alliance of Honour meetings, hopes also to be able to take part; the enterprise has his prayerful sympathy. Dr. Harry Guinness, the President of the Alliance, expects to devote considerable time to the undertaking, and the help of a host of other prominent and well-known speakers is to be secured. That such a campaign is timely there can be no doubt whatever, and it should be warmly supported by all sections of the community.

Supporting the Chairman were the Bishop of Lichfield, Bishop J. Taylor Smith (Chaplain-General to the Forces), the Bishop of Thetford, Lord Channing, General Bramwell Booth, Dr. Harry Guinness, Lord Haddo, Rev. Dinsdale T. Young, Mr. E. Smallwood, J.P., L.C.C., Dr. Heywood Smith, Alderman Dr. Rushbrooke, Messrs. E. E. Bagnall and A. B. Kent (joint acting directors), and others, several of whom delivered speeches of great spiritual power. Some striking singing by a large male voice choir, composed mainly of members of the Alliance of Honour, added much to the helpfulness of the gathering. Upon an appeal for fresh workers being made, over 500 names were given in.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE REGULARISATION OF EMPLOYMENT.

INTIMATELY bound up with the question of a living wage, which has claimed so large a share of recent discussions, is the problem of the regularisation of employment. The great discovery of the Poor Law Commission of 1909 was that an enormous proportion of our industrial population was suffering from chronic under-employment. The results of this state of affairs it is hardly necessary to indicate, but one of the worst is that so many poor households are kept going—and no stronger language can be used to describe the situation—by the irregular and not over well-paid labour of women, by charring, house-cleaning, &c. There are whole districts in London where this condition of affairs is a marked feature. In some seaside towns, Brighton, for instance, where there are few local industries, homes could not be kept together at all if it were not for the work of the wives. It is hardly necessary to point out that this is bad for the wives, bad for the husbands, bad for the children, and ultimately therefore bad for the whole community. In certain more or less regular industries, also, such as dock labour, it has been pointed out again and again that the supply of workers is always by many thousands greater than the demand. Mr. R. Williams, the northern director of Labour Exchanges, has recently been working out a scheme for the decasualisation of dock labour, which appears to be a thoroughly sound and practicable method, based on the results of actual experience.

A few years ago also a number of students of the London School of Economics took up the subject of seasonal trades as a topic for investigation. It is commonly supposed that work is slack in the winter and more easily obtainable in the summer, but in reality such is the multiplicity and variety of modern trades, there is no month of the year where there is not some industry at its busiest and some other at its slackest. Moreover, the busy season is often due to mere habit and custom. There is, for instance, no special reason why in certain parts of England nearly every lady in a certain walk of life should have a new hat or a new dress for Whit Sunday. A few weeks before or after this day would not matter very much, but if everybody insists on new apparel for Whit Sunday it means a rush before and a slump afterwards. Whit Sunday is a movable feast, and therefore it is not weather but custom which dictates the demand.

The low rate of unemployment during the past few years, the lowest since statistics began to be compiled, has put the question of unemployment out of sight for the general public, who still stick to the national habit of dealing with things piecemeal, or as difficulties arise—a commendable mental tendency as a rule, though sometimes rather short-sighted. As long ago as the publication of the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission it was pointed out that something might be done to steady the volume of employment, if public contracts which can often be held over to a more convenient season were given out when private industry tends to be slack. It is good news, therefore, to hear that a Committee has been appointed by the Treasury "to consider whether any, and if so what, steps might be taken with a view to regularising the total demand for labour from year to year and in different seasons by adjusting the distribution of public work conducted or given out by Government Departments and local authorities with reference to the state of employment in the particular trades from time to time." The composition of the Committee, over which Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., is to preside, is admirable. Lord Henry Cavendish-Bentinck, M.P., Mr. G. N. Barnes, M.P., Mr. W. H. Beveridge, Mr. Cyril Jackson are outstanding names on the roll of social workers. We shall look forward, therefore, to a sane, well-informed, and practical report as the result of the labours of the Committee, and hope that the publication of it will take place before the next cycle of unemployment comes upon us.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

A SALE of work organised by the members of the City Temple in aid of the Pioneer Preachers' Fund (established by the Rev. R. J. Campbell) will be held in the Library and board room of the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, on Thursday, May 21. The opening ceremony will be performed at 1.30 by Lady Stapley, the Rev. R. J. Campbell in the chair, and a public luncheon will follow in the board room, at which Mr. Campbell will again preside, supported by Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., the Rev. T. P. Spedding, and others.

THE Child Welfare Housing and Town Planning Exhibition, to be held at the Imperial Institute under the auspices of the Victoria League next week, will be an important contribution to the public knowledge of these subjects. Many of the Colonial Governments will show plans and models of work that is being done overseas, and there will be a full representation of modern housing conditions in the United Kingdom. The Marquis of Salisbury will declare the Exhibition open on Monday, the 18th, and on subsequent days speeches will be delivered by Mrs. Humphry Ward, the Earl of Lytton and Mr. Waldorf Astor, M.P., while singing games and Morris dances will be performed by children from the Hampstead Garden Suburb and the Guild of Play.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Birmingham.—The Waverley-road Church, Small Heath, held its George Dawson anniversary service in the Birmingham Town Hall on Sunday last. In spite of very unpropitious weather the hall was crowded. The Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, M.A., preached the sermon, taking for her text St. Matthew xvi. 24. The Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, she said, was a Gospel of progress, its central law being the law of self-conquest. She traced the workings of this law through the history of the Christian Church, and ended by applying it both to the individual and national life of our day. Our time is crying out, she said, for men and women willing and able to lead the advance guard of progress for the reconstitution and uplifting of society.

Halifax.—The Sunday school anniversary services were held at Northgate End Chapel, on Sunday, May 10, the sermons being preached by the Rev. Dr. S. H. Mellone, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester. In the afternoon a scholars' service was held, when the Rev. W. Lawrence Schroeder delivered an address. The collections, which were in aid of the school funds, amounted to £26 0s. 5d.

Liverpool.—The annual display of the Boys' Own Brigade was held at the Domestic Mission Mill-street, on April 30, the 7th Company (Mill-street), 8th Company (Hamilton-road), 9th Company (Birkenhead), and 11th Company (Bootle) taking part under the command of Captains Norman Hall, Geo. Lane, Lieut. E. W. Willmer, and Captain Geo. Williams, respectively. Under the superintendence of Major A. C. McCann an interesting programme was carried out in an excellent manner. Special mention should be made of the improvement in the bands of the 7th and 8th Companies, and great credit is due to the bandmasters. The Chairman of the battalion, Mr. C. Sydney Jones, C.C., J.P., inspected each company, and afterwards congratulated the officers and boys on the way the work had been done. As an example of the value of training in discipline, and of courage, he referred to the presentation of a certificate by the Liverpool Humane Society to James Metcalfe, a lance-corporal in the Hamilton-road company, for attempting to rescue a little girl from a fire. Mr. F. C. Bowring, C.C., J.P., president of the Mission, proposed a vote of thanks to Major McCann. The attendance (127) was a record for any battalion parade. The battalion treasurer and secretary, Messrs. Laurence D. Holt, C.C., and Laurence Hall, and a number of friends were also present.

London: Dingley-place.—A well-attended course of lectures on "Sick Nursing," given to the members of the Mothers' Meeting at the Domestic Mission, Dingley-place, St. Luke's, has just been concluded. On Sunday there was a church parade of the Boys' Own Brigade when there were present companies from Hackney and Limehouse, comprising about 70 officers and boys. A special hymn, written for the occasion, was sung. The Window Gardening Committee has just met to make preliminary arrangements for the annual flower show.

London: Stamford-street.—The annual gymnastic competition for the Marian Pritchard memorial shield took place at Stamford-street Chapel on April 30. Four companies of the London battalion competed, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5, and after a very interesting display the shield was awarded to company No. 3, who gained 662 marks out of a possible 960. The marks given to the remaining companies were as follows:—No. 1, 646½; No. 2, 648; No. 5, 566.

Sidmouth.—A social gathering was held on April 30, in the Old Meeting school-room, to bid farewell to the Rev. William Agar, on his resignation of the pulpit. A presentation was made to him and Mrs. Agar on behalf of the congregation. While regretting the loss of Mr. Agar as minister, much pleasure was expressed at the announcement that Mr. and Mrs. Agar propose to remain in Sidmouth.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY FOR THE PROTECTION OF BIRDS.

The spring number of Bird Notes and News, forming the first part of Vol. vi. of the organ of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, is a special Plumage Bill number, and reports at length on the debate on the second reading of the Bill. The attitude of the trade in contesting the further progress of this measure, after the overwhelming majority in its favour, by bringing up amendment after amendment in committee, illustrates the need for the vigilance of the Society and its sympathisers, and the huge quantities of plumes (including many rare birds of Paradise) offered at the London sales recently afford fresh proof of the instant need for such legislation. A list of Plumage Bill literature is supplied for the benefit of those who wish to obtain publications on the subject, and attention is drawn to the fund which it has been necessary to raise in order to extend the campaign against traffickers in plumes. Further donations will be gratefully received at 23, Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W. It may be mentioned that some 20,000 of the very attractive plumage cards, and over 50,000 campaign leaflets have been individually addressed by post, in addition to hundreds of personal letters sent to influential and interested persons.

TWENTY-FIRST WORLD PEACE CONGRESS.

The twenty-first World Peace Congress, organised by the International Commission of the Berne International Peace Bureau, will take place at Vienna from September 15 to 19. It will mark the completion of a quarter of a century's pacifist work, in the course of which twenty congresses have been held in various countries in addition to several general meetings, and it is fitting that the delegates should meet, at last, in Austria, which is ruled by a monarch who is one of the most determined advocates of peace. The meetings will be held in the Parliament Buildings, and among those whose names appear on the programme which has been drawn up provisionally are M. Emile Arnaud, President of the League of Peace and Liberty, and Vice-President of the Berne International Peace Bureau of Paris; Mr. Carl Heath, Secretary of the National Peace Council, London; Professor Dr. Ludwig Quidde, Member of the Bavarian Diet, Munich; Dr. G. Grosch, Secretary of the German Peace Society, Stuttgart; M. Miljukoff, member of the Duma, St. Petersburg; Dr. James L. Tryon, General Secretary of the American Peace Society, Boston; Mr. G. H. Perris, and Sir Alfred Turner. At the close of the Congress a trip will be made down the Danube to Budapesth at the invitation of the Hungarian Peace Society.

NEW ENGLAND AS A FACTOR IN THE PEACE MOVEMENT.

Speaking at the Conference of the New England Peace Societies in January, Mr. James L. Tryon reminded his hearers that in New England the American Peace Society made its home for nearly a century, that it supports six State peace societies at the present day, and that, in addition, the World Peace Foundation has its headquarters in Boston. Taking this fact into consideration, together with the important part which the public men of New England have played in the movement for international arbitration, it seems singularly appropriate that the citizens of Massachusetts should co-operate with the citizens of her sister States in the festival of nations which is to be held to mark the anniversary of the signing of the Treaty of Ghent. To this end an address to the people of Massachusetts expressing the hope that they will observe in a suitable way the commemoration of the hundred years of peace has been drawn up and signed by a number of representative American men and women who are interested in this subject.

"THE sons of Massachusetts," the address points out, "native and adopted, have through all the intercourse of the United States with Great Britain had a conspicuous part both in making peace and preventing war. Benjamin Franklin and John Adams signed the treaty that ended the struggle of the Revolution. John Quincy Adams was chairman of the American commissioners who made the Treaty of Ghent, which ended the War of 1812. Daniel Webster, Secretary of State, appointed from Massachusetts, negotiated with Lord Ashburton the Webster-Ashburton Treaty, which adjusted dangerous difficulties with Great Britain, some of them relating to the Canadian border. Joshua Bates successfully served as umpire in the adjudication of claims between our two countries. Charles Francis Adams was a member of the Geneva tribunal which settled the controversy over the Alabama Claims, the most important of international arbitrations. Eminent members of the Massachusetts bar have participated in nearly all the other great arbitrations which have been held from the time of the Jay Treaty until to-day, including the Alaskan Boundary and the Fisheries Cases. Among the ministers of the United States to Great Britain have been three members of the Adams family, besides Edward Everett, George Bancroft, Abbott Lawrence, John Lothrop Motley, and James Russell Lowell, names which are held in high respect by our people. George Peabody, a common benefactor of both nations, was an ambassador of goodwill between them. The writings of Longfellow, Emerson, Lowell, Hawthorne, Whittier, and Holmes have been potent not only in promoting friendship with Great Britain, but with the world." The address is issued by the Massachusetts Peace Society.

PROBLEM No. 57.

By BRIAN HARLEY.

(From The Morning Post.)

BLACK. (13 men.)

WHITE. (12 men.)

White to play and mate in two moves.

SOLUTION OF No. 55.

1. K. K2 (key-move).

Correct solutions have been received from O. Lupton, Geo. Ingledew (and No. 54), E. C. (Highbury), A. S. Rodgers, E. Wright, W. E. Arkell, R. B. D. (Edinburgh), Rev. I. Wrigley, J. W. (Belfast), Rev. B. C. Constable, F. S. M. (Mayfield).

No. 55 has, of course, been given great prominence in the chess press, and has met with universal admiration. The beautiful play when 1...R.R8 is apt to be overlooked by the hasty; yet it leads to one of the best mates. It has not been found particularly difficult by the average solver, but the strategy, taking the fewness of the men into account, is of a very high order. Many accepted critics have said that it is just such a one as Loyd himself would have composed, without being in any sense a plagiarism.

No. 57, by my friend Mr. Brian Harley, gave much pleasure to the solvers in the Morning Post. There is rather a crowd of force, but the key, and the complications which ensue after its discovery, are most ingenious and surprising.

I recently saw a two-mover composed by the American champion, F. J. Marshall, which only serves to prove that the typical fine match-player has no leaning towards imaginary positions. It is elementary, and has the attributes of a position composed by a novice. There are a few notable exceptions to this curious phenomenon. Amongst players of the first rank (masters) are to be found Teichmann, Schlechter, Berger—all Germans, who compose first-rate problems. There are a fair number of players who are good solvers and capable critics, but the average match-player's ideas as to a really good problem are quite beside the mark; give him a gem where the relative strength may be out of all proportion (and yet a good problem), he is quite at sea. Lasker himself has composed a few problems, but they would stand no chance whatever in an ordinary tourney.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Welsh Church Bill passed its third reading in the House of Commons on Tuesday evening by a majority of 77, and will in the natural course of things receive the Royal Assent at the close of the present session of Parliament. We can understand the sentimental objections to the measure which are felt strongly by many people, who regard the present recognition of the Church of England by the State almost as part of the natural order of things. But it is difficult to suppose that the able men in the House of Commons, who have denounced it as an attack upon religion inspired by jealousy and vindictiveness or as a final separation between politics and Christianity, can really have examined the meaning of their own words. We never think of establishing one form of Christian worship in any of our colonies, and he would be a bold man who would tell high-minded Australians or Canadians that in consequence of this omission spiritual forces have no influence in public affairs. It is astonishing how insular we remain, in spite of our swelling imperial sentiments, in our attitude to many of our home problems.

It has been the policy of the opponents of the Bill hitherto to offer uncompromising opposition to the Disendowment clauses. But the situation will change rapidly in the course of the next few weeks, and the easy task will be undertaken of making good the loss. All the talk about crippling the activities of the Church for lack of means held in reserve the certainty that the members of the Church of England, with their command of great wealth, will never allow anything of the kind to happen. The whole case for Disendowment is one upon which good men may differ. It is not a clear and simple question of right and wrong. Speaking for ourselves, there seems to us to be a clear distinction between the property belonging to a private person or denomination and the endowments enjoyed by a national body which is subject to parliamentary control. Such endowments are "public" or "national" in a sense in which these terms cannot be applied to other forms of property. For this reason Parliament may vary their use without any infringement of the rights of ownership. In the case of the Welsh Bill a clear distinction has been drawn between these ancient national endowments and the gifts which were made at a later date by private donors for specific purposes.

THERE was a curious article by "Artifex" in the Manchester Guardian on Thursday, in which he tries to minimise the importance of Dr. Sanday's pamphlet, to which we called attention last week. He sees in it an honourable desire on the part of Dr. Sanday to take his stand by the side of men whom he feels to have been unfairly attacked, and to preserve the comprehensiveness and breadth of the Church of England at a moment of crisis; but after all, such is the soothing discovery, "his latest pamphlet is not really a departure from the position he took up in his earlier writings." Now this is a plain contradiction of what Dr. Sanday himself says. He tells us, in language so simple and clear that we should have thought no one could possibly misunderstand it, that his mind has grown and changed in certain directions and that he finds himself now unable to accept certain miracles which he formerly defended. What is the use of trying to explain away this salient fact in the situation? We know that it will be deeply disturbing to many people. We shall not be surprised if it is quietly and politely ignored in the very quarters which rang with denunciations of Mr. J. M. Thompson's book on Miracles. But does any man in his senses really believe that the situation can be saved by mushy thinking and a refusal to face the live issues of criticism and thought? Evidently Dr. Sanday does not think so, and that is one reason why we are so deeply grateful to him for his candour.

THE National Peace Council celebrated Peace Day on Monday in what may fairly be described as a jubilant mood. Mr. Gordon Harvey said that the movement towards international peace was "full of happy auguries." Mr. Moscheles said that man must now learn to be "a law-abiding citizen of the world." And Sir Edward Boyle referred with great satisfaction to the momentous statement of Sir Edward Grey, to the effect that the delegates of the approaching International Conference could be instructed to consider, with a view to making it agreeable to the sentiment of this country, the proposal for the immunity of private property in time of war, which pacifists had continually supported.

At the annual meeting of the Social Welfare Association for London, which was held at the Mansion House on Monday afternoon, Mr. Herbert Samuel spoke hopefully of the growing co-operation between Government departments and philanthropic associations. In this respect a change had come over the whole spirit of Government. The Social Welfare Association, with the aid of the Local Government Board officials and the police, had grappled with the question of the homeless poor of London, and had succeeded in bringing together all the societies which were devoted to that problem. In 1912 that committee developed into an official committee under the control of the Local Government Board and the police. As a result there had been a great decline in the number of those who wandered about the streets of London at night. Many of those poor creatures had been placed upon the right road to self-emancipation; and the Embankment, which was for so many years a national scandal, had been entirely cleared of the vagrants who had previously made it their Mecca after nightfall. But by far the most important work which the Social Welfare Association had set itself was the problem of the vagrant child. That poor helpless little victim, who was offered neither moral protection nor education, would shortly be legislated for by Parliament; and the money to help it would be provided from a central fund.

THE resignation of the pulpit of the King's Weigh House Church by the Rev. E. W. Lewis, and the few sentences of explanation from his letter to his congregation which have been given to the world, will cause little surprise to those who have read some of his recent articles in our columns with sympathetic understanding, or have had other opportunities of insight into the workings of his mind.

"I have often asked myself at the close of a Sunday whether I myself were prepared to do what in my sermon I had been urging you to do. . . .

"I have felt for some time the incongruity between the position of being a man of God and the position of being a comparatively highly-salaried, comfortably-conditioned official in organised religion. . . .

"I am seeking personal poverty and the simplest kind of life, and also an unorganised and irregular form of preaching, a kind of wayside sowing of the seed."

These words need no adornment either of comment or criticism. Mr. Lewis has made the difficult choice and cut himself free from the entanglements, which he felt were hindering his best life. He may be wise or foolish as the world measures such things. That is not the question. It is not prosperity or the praise of men which matters supremely to him, but the life of the soul and the vision of God. He may succeed or he may fail in his quest. But who will dare to pity him, or even wish to call him back as he goes forth on his great adventure?

CITIZENSHIP AND THE PULPIT.

SIR EDWARD RUSSELL, of the Liverpool Daily Post, is one of the people who has learned the art of combining real breadth of mind with perfect naturalness. He is a Churchman without a trace of patronage for Nonconformists. He belongs to that large and vague group of people known as orthodox, and he can associate on easy and happy terms with heretics without self-consciousness or a word of apology. The gift is sufficiently rare to be worthy of remark. Some people may account for it by the fact that he is a journalist, whose business it is to be all things to all men. We prefer to attribute it to the deeper cause, that he is a Christian who has the wisdom to look below the surface. In a speech at the meeting held recently to welcome the Rev. S. A. MELLOR to the ministry of Hope-street Church, he expressed himself with a cordiality which must have given all the greater pleasure because it was so obviously not the language of mere compliment. "Ordinary sentimental assurances of goodwill," he said, "between persons of different denominations in this country do not, I confess, deeply interest me. They are generally very jejune; I have known them to be somewhat insincere; at all events they are not definite enough in their treatment of differences, and in their treatment of agreements, to be of great utility. My own opinion is that every denomination in this country makes special contributions to the general stock of spiritual good." A man who adopts this point of view with complete sincerity can appear in any company without the risk of misunderstanding. Indeed, it will never occur to him to regard misunderstanding as a possibility with which he has to reckon in the fulfilment of simple human relationships with other good men.

But the speech of Sir EDWARD RUSSELL was devoted chiefly to the great tasks of citizenship and the function of the pulpit in regard to them. He welcomed a new personality among the ministers of Liverpool as a fresh centre of moral idealism, from which the conscience of the community would be able to draw stimulus and guidance. At this point, however, he proceeded to draw a distinction, which the reformer in his impatience with wrong often forgets, between the function of the educator of conscience and the maker of programmes. The minister, according to Sir EDWARD RUSSELL, who intrudes too scientific or too economic social discussions upon his hearers disturbs the balance of his preaching. "The first business of a minister of religion is religion; not only his first business but it is his one hope of doing any business or any good that can possibly be done." That this is not a method of shelving the whole question is seen very clearly in the tone of approval with which he referred a little later on to the resolution in favour of a living wage which was passed recently by the bishops of the Northern Province. Here, if we understand the position rightly, is an affirmation of principle, a minimum social demand which must be brought right into the front of Christian thought and action, and Christian teachers must speak upon it with no uncertain voice, though the shaping of practical measures must be left to the calm deliberation of the legislator and the economist. We must, in other words, guard not only against the crimes of supine indifference, but also against the disasters of fervent advocacy and hasty generalisations without adequate thought. The minister of religion ought to speak quite clearly and with all the force at his command about the invincible claims of justice and right-living upon every member of the community; he ought to be a reservoir of moral power and to exert a revolutionary influence upon the callous comfort and the cruel indifference all around him. Christianity is intended to turn the world upside down. Let him realise that statement in all its disturbing significance for himself and for others, or let him give up the pretence of being a preacher. But at the same time he should be quite candid about his limitations; and one of them is this, that neither his training nor his subsequent experience have, as a rule, qualified him to act as an expert adviser in business or politics. There are wide departments of human activity where the clear calculating brain or the scientific precision of the trained investigator are as needful for the service of God and the welfare of his people as the more fervent methods of the pulpit.

We know how easy it is for the eager advocate, who believes in the power of hot words to blaze a straight pathway into the kingdom of God, to dismiss what we have just written as timid conservatism or hollow indifference. But charges of this kind do not wound us, for we know too well the pain of the world and the injustice that is done under the sun, ever to be satisfied with things as they are, or to blame those who are sometimes mastered by their indignation. The difference is not one of ultimate aim, but rather of method. There is need of much closer co-operation than exists to-day between the teachers of religion and the mass of lay-reformers, and this co-operation can be achieved best by a frank recognition of some division of function. And here the minister has no ground to complain that the more interesting part of the work must often be left to others. It is a greater work to create the spiritual conditions which make reform possible than to rush into the fray with some hasty scheme of our own. If it is harder, certainly it is not less necessary, to make men really anxious to do justly and to love mercy than to provide them with a complete programme of their duties. We do not mean that the minister of religion should not take his place with other students and workers, so far as he has time and opportunity; but he is first and foremost a sustainer of the enfeebled spiritual forces of the world, a creator of new conditions in the human heart. It is here that he ought to speak with authority, because he knows, with a note of conviction which has no trace of doubt or weak compromise about it. And in so far as he is able to do this he is serving the need of the present hour in the most practical way. For it is spiritual power alone which moves the world. It is because men do not love enough that tens of thousands rot in misery in our great cities, and hundreds at the other end of the scale drag out a useless daily existence in the midst of luxury, which is a more bitter curse to their souls than poverty can ever be. If only they could discover what life really means; if only they could see in a flash of heavenly light the meaning of the Cross of CHRIST and the judgment it passes daily on their lives, the end of this present social order would have come, for the new earth would be born. This is the preacher's task, to give new force and direction to creative love in the world. His strength will never be equal to it. But to this he must give himself, laying aside every weight, with complete dedication of heart, every day and all his days to the end.

THE PIONEER PREACHERS.

THE opening of the new and more commodious hostel for the Pioneer Preachers last week marks a step forward in the direction of stability and settled life. It is intended that the movement shall no longer be regarded as experimental, for it has entered into possession of a permanent home. We hope that we shall be forgiven if we say that the occasion is one for careful and candid thought on the part of those who are chiefly responsible for its control. Hitherto there has been some indefiniteness of ideal and vagueness of aim, and the public imagination has hardly been stirred by the advent of a new and original force in religious work. What is the future policy to be? In his speech at the opening of the new Hostel the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL recalled his original idea, and almost took for granted that it is still the paramount aim. The Pioneer Preachers of his dream were to represent a new form of liberal evangelism. They were to be free from the hundred and one cares which beset the life of the ordinary minister, and to go forth in the joy of poverty as wandering preachers of the word. As a matter of fact a large part of their work is that of the ordinary ministry in settled congregations, and the figures quoted at the meeting show that they are immersed, almost to the point of intellectual and spiritual suffocation, in precisely the kind of work of distracting detail which Mr. CAMPBELL deprecated.

It will undoubtedly be the line of least resistance for the latter kind of work to go on, and in this way there will be a steady flow of men into the regular ministry without University training or the high and exacting mental discipline, which is needful for the preacher who is to speak with knowledge and power at the present time. We believe that such a course will soon cease to command public respect, and can only end in failure and disillusion. But in spite of these temporary drawbacks the movement has in it rich possibilities of good, if it is rightly guided. It should be under the direct personal control of a man of fine mental gifts and dedicated life, who would lead the activities of the community and himself share in all its daily work. It should make it its aim to attract men after their college course is over rather than before, and enlist them at least for a period of years in the service of its ideals. It is no use for liberal Christianity to encourage community life and an order of preachers, unless it leaves no stone unturned to recruit for this new form of service men at least as able and as richly endowed both by nature and education as those who join the Cowley Fathers or the Community of the Resurrection. Here no second-best will serve.

In saying this do not let us be misunderstood. We have the highest regard for the little group of Pioneer Preachers, and the earnest and self-sacrificing work in which they are engaged. They are doing their best and that best is good. But the whole movement is still in its initial stages, and we are thinking about it from the point of view of public policy, not merely as a matter of to-day and tomorrow, but also of the far-away future. Nor is there the faintest shadow of snobbery in our mind. We think that the men with the requisite simplicity of character and clearness of aim and capacity for self-sacrifice will be found among the very poor. We hope that it will be so. But the detachment from worldly ambitions and the social sympathy, which are often found combined with real moral greatness in the poor man, are not enough, essential as these qualifications undoubtedly are. He needs knowledge and discipline of thought and some sense of a vast historical background to his own life. Then, when he is trained, when he has really opened his eyes and begun to see, let him avoid the tempting snares of a more settled ministry and join the little community of pioneers and go forth as a preacher of the new evangelism.

RELIGION AND THE SUPERNORMAL.

II.

WE have seen that, as regards the phenomena of spiritualism, the attempt to make them a basis for the apprehension of the Infinite has resulted in a de-spiritualising process very far from the goal of religion. Let us turn now to such manifestations as Mental Healing and New Thought philosophy.

The various cults which claim the dominion of man over physical ill, whether through the cultivation of the will, the power of prayer, or the flat denial of the fact that pain and disease exist at all, are extremely popular in these pain-shunning days. Some base themselves upon Christianity, regarding its founder as "the Master-Healer," others repudiate all connection with religion; some ally themselves with medical science, others directly oppose it. But all agree in asserting the supremacy of mind over matter, and in condemning the almost criminal laissez faire with which—as it seems to them—men acquiesce in the continuance of suffering whilst all the time possessed of latent powers, the exertion and cultivation of which might abolish it altogether. The disciples of these cults devote themselves to publishing abroad what they regard as a new and revolutionising discovery. They have found, they think, a key to the riddle of the universe; they are the benefactors of their kind; they have a glorious gospel to proclaim to suffering humanity—a gospel of Health and Healing and Happiness. And bound up with this view of the world's pain is the "Joy Philosophy" of the New Thought school. We have but to train our wills and the world is at our feet. Moral perfection as well as physical is within our reach. Utter concentration of purpose and desire, absolute and unquestioning faith in our power to do so, will wring from the iron hand of circumstance inevitable surrender. All good gifts, whether they be moral qualities such as courage and perseverance, or material advantages such as an increased income and a handsome motor car, are ours by right. We have but to demand them with sufficient firmness, and they are bound to come. "The Church of Silent Demand," in which we may all concentrate upon the things we covet, is the imposing edifice which crowns one writer's presentment of these truths. (Prentice Mulford, Essays.) But, setting aside the obvious exaggerations in this particular branch of the psychic, let us consider the relation of its main positions to Christianity, and see how far the practice of its arts may be a part of the Christian scheme.

Immediately two things present themselves to our minds. First, the "miracles" of healing which Jesus undoubtedly practised: the curing of diseases, the alleviation of suffering, the casting out of devils, and the continuance of that power in the lives of the saints, presenting a remarkable parallel with the cures effected at the present day—especially upon nervous ailments—by mental or spiritual control; the efficacy, too, which He assigned to faith, and his words about its power to remove mountains. But almost at the same moment we are conscious of the second thing—a vision of the Man of Sorrows submitting himself to the law of suffering which he had proved himself able to transcend in the case of others, and conquering the world from the Cross of his pain and humiliation. He had foreseen the cry of "Physician, heal thyself," and in his last hour the taunt flung at the pain-wracked sufferer was, "If thou be Christ, save thyself, and come down from the Cross."

Nineteen hundred years have passed since that victory was won, and men and women with the light of joyful discovery in their eyes are hugging to their bosoms a new-found panacea for "the old woe o' the world." And as they hurry hither and thither spreading the knowledge of this new balm for the wounds of humanity, they pause for an instant at the foot of that Cross, which was once "to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness." And they, too, are impatient that the suffering figure still hangs there, mutely spurning, by his calm endurance, the glorious gifts they hold. Into the battle with weakness and pain they will follow him gladly, going forth conquering and to conquer in the strength of powers they share with him. But into this dark place of failure and defeat how, they ask, can it be expected that they will enter? Are they deliberately to lay aside those shining, newly polished weapons which have already done such valiant service, to bear in meek submission the thrust of nail and spear? So they turn away from the victory of Love, to seek once more the path of Power. They have missed the meaning of the paradox upon which Christianity—and human life itself—is built, the paradox of dying to live, of losing to find. To them, the mystics speak an unknown language when they tell of the mingled agony and ecstasy of the pilgrims of Love; when they say, as Catherine of Siena did, that if they could "have joy in this life and joy eternal beside, they do not want it, because they delight so greatly in conforming themselves to Christ crucified; nay, they want to live rather by the way of the Cross and pain, than without pain."

This twofold realisation, of these hidden potentialities of our nature known and used by Jesus for others, and his abandonment of them for his own need, should give us the age-long reply of Christianity to the challenge of the occult. No new discoveries have been made. The control of mind over matter has always been an element in Christianity. At times we have ignored it altogether, at times we have adjudged it to bring discredit on the whole religion; at others, again, we have brought it forward as the most precious treasure it contains. Let it be the task of our own day to put it into its right place, as a permanent element in Christianity, but one which is subservient to others. So-called "occult" powers are the inevitable accompaniment of intense spirituality. They assert themselves wherever there is a tendency to feed spirit at the expense of matter. But they are not to be sought as ends in themselves. We are missing a greater glory in isolating them as we do. As far as Christianity as a whole is concerned, they are merely its by-products—things to be added to us as an inevitable consequence of having first sought the Kingdom of God and His righteousness. The power of the human will and the necessity for its cultivation are undoubted facts; but the aim of the Christian is not to strengthen it till he can force destiny to breaking point, but rather to purity it till it is in perfect harmony with the will of God; till, like Dante, he is crowned king and bishop of himself, all his passions and desires stilled within the oneness of the divine will.

How great is the temptation to overestimate the importance of psychic gifts, and to pervert them to unworthy uses, is exemplified for the Christian in the mysterious struggle of his Master in the wilderness. There two distinct claims to supremacy were made on behalf of psychic powers, and met by two distinct refusals to use them for ends which were inherently selfish or trivial, and one at least of which could have had no worthier motive than that of "showing off." (See Matt. iv. 5, 6.) The whole danger of the temptations lay, not in the possibility that the tests proposed would fail, but in the certainty that they would succeed. To yield to the first two would inevitably have been to yield to the third; for where the human will has defied the divine, evil has already received its homage—the kingdoms of the world are swayed by the hard, metallic, empty voice of Power, and the tender accents of self-sacrificing Love are for ever hushed.

It is not only in the example of Jesus, however, but also in his direct teaching, that we may find guidance as to our use of these mental powers. The burden of Matt. vii. is "by their fruits ye shall know them"; it is an assertion—almost vehement in its earnestness—of the truth that the supreme test of every man is not what he professes, but what he does, not his belief, but his life. "Not everyone that saith unto me, 'Lord, Lord,' shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Taken by itself, the statement is simple and practical enough, but it is followed immediately by a concrete instance of which the implications are significant indeed. "Many will say to me in that day, 'Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works?' And then will I profess to them, 'I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity.'" The inference is obvious. To make use of occult knowledge, to heal the afflicted, to work marvels, to proclaim these things the business of the Christian life, is not to do the will of the Father; it is—or rather it may be, in certain circumstances—to "work iniquity." One recalls another occasion upon which Jesus, with an inclusiveness and tolerance which shocked his disciples, forbade them to rebuke a man who was employing gifts of healing without any reference to Christ. "He that is not against us is on our part." One imagines that this man, though the words "Lord, Lord," were not upon his lips, was actuated by purer motives than those in the hypothetical case of Christ. There, under the shelter of the Master's name, lurked the insidious love of display, of showing off powers which, though they may originally have been the outcome of exceptional spirituality, were now being exploited for mere self-aggrandisement. The man who followed not the Master outwardly may yet have been full of his spirit, and was using his powers for the sheer love of the suffering human beings whom he found himself able to relieve.

So we see that Christ's teaching on this subject contains no contradiction. The command to "Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils" is binding upon his followers still. Freely we may yet receive of these powers; freely we are to give. But it must indeed be a giving—a full and free self-spending, our hearts afire with love for the Giver, and for the least of his little ones who suffer.

But directly the thought of self creeps in, directly we take delight in exhibiting our supernatural powers to the common herd, and become like Moses, smiting the rock in arrogance and pride—then the sweet works of mercy are turned to bitterness, and have earned, not the warm friendship of the Master's heart, but the cold disavowal that He has ever known us.

Since the above was written, the Report of the Committee on "Spiritual Healing" has appeared, and no contribution to the discussion of the subject would now be complete without some reference to it. Its conclusions have already been summarised in THE INQUIRER, and its main position will be seen to be very largely that of the present article. That Religion and Science should have combined to produce such a Report is a fact fraught with significance at this time of unrest and transition. Hitherto, in the unhappy controversies of our day, Religion has generally been allied with the supernatural, Science with reason. And because reason and the supernatural have an inherent antipathy to each other Religion and Science have too often been divided into separate camps, where superstition and materialism have respectively held sway. But now we seem to catch glimpses of the dawning of a new day, in which those warring elements shall be replaced by one to which Religion and Science shall both pay homage. The dim spectre of supernaturalism—that lazy, labour-saving "press-the-button" device for shirking the responsibilities of religion—is disappearing. So is the hard and rigid outline which is all the pitiless light of reason ever shows us. And we are recognising a mightier power which shall ultimately change our strife to peace, laying bare, and glorifying with a new radiance the purely natural process by which apparently unnatural or "miraculous" results are obtained. From the ancient treasure of the Christian gospel a new message is being unfolded. It is inspiring the utterances alike of the man of science and of the mystic. "Everywhere," said Max Müller, "the natural is divine; the supernatural or miraculous is human." "Therefore God becomes as we are that we may be as He is," said William Blake.

We may thank God that at last we are making reverent acknowledgment of the potency of this factor in the healing of the world's dis-ease—that the Church on the one hand is embracing with her Master's inclusiveness the scientist and the "mental" healer, and that Science, on the other, is hastening to join hands with a spiritual force which can penetrate to deeper depths, soar to giddier heights, than reason alone could ever touch.

In reference to the article, "A Book Sealed," by J. T. D., which appeared last week, a correspondent writes:—Honour to whom honour is due. The author of the striking novel, "The House with the Green Shutters," was not James Douglas, but the late George Douglas, whose premature death was a sad loss to Scottish fiction.

DISESTABLISHMENT AND DISENDOWMENT.

SIR,—The Third Reading of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill seems an appropriate occasion for the restatement of the general principles underlying this question, which have, perhaps inevitably, been somewhat obscured in the dust of conflict.

Religion, it must be remembered always, is a private, personal matter between man and his Maker. It is, therefore, the duty of the State to leave it alone, save when, under the guise of religion, practices which are inimical to the welfare of the community, such as suttee in India, are carried on. In other words, the State must give each Church a fair field and no favour. It is a breach of this obligation if one particular church receive the special recognition of the State, for that is tantamount to bestowing a special hall-mark of authenticity on the principles of the denomination in question. Of course, persons attracted thus are of no particular use to a church, but had they, before joining one, to exercise their power of judgment by reason of all denominations standing on the same legal footing, they might be.

The non-recognition by the State of any particular church does not mean any diminution in the religious strength of the nation, for that can consist only of the sum of the religious strength of the individuals composing the nation. Nor does it necessarily mean the neglect of religious observances on official occasions if the same be thought desirable. There are no established churches in the United States, yet the Legislature there, like our House of Commons, has its Chaplain, with the not unimportant difference that the most suitable man from any denomination may be appointed; while here, the choice is limited to a man professing certain prescribed tenets. It is hardly necessary, however, to argue the case for disestablishment, when even a stalwart like Mr. F. E. Smith admits himself as being in favour of it. Let me rather point out to those good people who favour Disestablishment, but not Disendowment, why the conjunction of the two is just and inevitable.

It is pertinent, in the first place, to observe that Disendowment is limited to ancient endowments, i.e., those prior to 1662, the Church being given the benefit of the doubt where it is impossible to say whether an endowment be ancient or modern. (Many people would seem to be singularly unaware of this limitation.) All modern endowments have, obviously, been given to the Anglican Church as a distinct denomination, and, therefore, are rightly retained by it. Ancient endowments, however, stand on a very different footing. They were given to the Church at a time when all English people—or, at any rate, all English Protestants, which, legally, comes to the same thing, Roman Catholicism being then proscribed—thought for all practical purposes alike in religious matters, so that obviously the donors (whether individuals or, as in the case of tithe, the State) intended the endowments for the use of the nation as a whole, and, as most people know, anyone who cares to do so is entitled to benefit by the endowments by availing himself of the ministrations of the clergy of the State Church. When, therefore, the identity between the Church and the nation ceases in name, as it has already ceased in fact, it is the proper thing to apply the ancient endowments to national (or municipal) purposes, so that the whole people, or, at least, all the inhabitants of a particular locality, may benefit from them once again, as was originally intended.

Let us look at it another way. The mediæval Church, as Mr. C. F. G. Masterman (himself a Churchman) has put it, discharged the functions appertaining to the modern Poor Law, the modern hospital, and the modern school. Now that the Church has ceased to discharge those functions, what can be fairer than that property given to her when she did discharge them should be handed over to authorities which are doing that work to-day? One word in conclusion. Unitarians (or, if the term be preferred, Liberal Christians) desire, perhaps, more than others intercourse with the Church of England, and, as things stand, are more excluded from it. Disestablishment, by promoting religious equality, will tend to an alteration here.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

A NEW "GOLDEN TREASURY."

The New Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics. Edited by Ernest Rhys. London: J. M. Dent and Sons. 1s. net.

PALGRAVE'S "Golden Treasury" has long taken rank among the precious books in our literature as an anthology of English poetry almost perfect within its limits, but there have been many anthologies since 1861, when it was first published, and clearly, so long as the springs from which they are drawn flow on undiminished, there are bound to be many more. Only those who have attempted such a task can estimate, as Mr. Rhys says in his introduction to the "New Golden Treasury," "what the lyric wealth of our poetry actually is, or how many exquisite songs and poems, which to-day we are in danger of forgetting, still await their selection"; and this leaves out of account the rich harvest that lies close to hand in contemporary poetry. This little companion volume to the familiar "Golden Treasury" will, however, serve our turn for some time to come. Though it traverses much of the ground covered by Mr. Palgrave, it ranges both farther back and further forward in point of time, so as to include, at the beginning, some of Chaucer's poems and the spring-like, early songs written before or during his period, and, at the end, selections from poets long since dead, for the most part, who yet seem to belong to our own time. There is no overlapping, and although the same names frequently appear, of necessity, in both books, they are not represented by the same poems, and in many cases a better selection appears to have been made. In the "New Golden Treasury," for instance, Vaughan's "Beauteous Death" ("They are all gone into the realms of light"), and "The World" appear—a notable addition. Spenser's "Epithalamion" (which Mr. Palgrave did not consider in harmony with mid-Victorian manners!) is again left out, presumably on account of its great length. The book is further enriched by several songs of Campion, and some of his anonymous contemporaries, which have only come to light since the "Golden Treasury" was first published, and a cluster of Tennyson's perfect lyrics. Tennyson, it will be remembered, gave considerable assistance to Palgrave, but only on condition that he himself was left out. Now Blake has also been included, and the Brownings, Matthew Arnold, D. G. and Christina Rossetti, George Meredith, Jean Ingelow, Emily Brontë, A. H. Clough, Coventry Patmore, Swinburne, Lewis Morris, William Morris, R. Louis Stevenson, Wm. Sharp, John Davidson, and Francis Thompson—a sufficient indication of the wider scope of the "New Golden Treasury." Some of these poets are but meagrely represented, evidently for want of space, and there are still some names left out which some of us would like to see—W. E. Henley, for instance, E. Cracroft Lefroy, J. A. Symonds, Philip Bourke Marston, Eugene Lee Hamilton, and Frederick Myers—but we may well receive the good things that have been bestowed upon us with quiet joy and wait patiently for a further instalment.

THE CORNER STONE OF EDUCATION. An Essay on the Home Training of Children. By Edward Lyttelton, D.D. London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.

THE Head-Master of Eton has an excellent subject, and one upon which he can speak with authority. Our disappointment is all the greater, that somehow his book seems to miss fire. Was it written in odd moments snatched from a busy life? or did he commit the fatal error of beginning without any clear plan in his mind? Be the reason what it may, we fear the book must be pronounced formless and dull, and it is likely in consequence to have the least effect upon just the people who need its teaching most. But having said this, as we felt in duty bound to do, let us hasten to assure parents and others who are concerned with the training of young children that there is here a personal point of view, which deserves their earnest consideration, and a large store of acute observation. Dr. Lyttelton gives the full weight of his large experience to the conclusion that it is the earliest years in the home with its parents that fix the prevailing characteristics of a child's nature, and give it a lasting moral bias towards simple honesty and unselfishness or towards secretiveness and the prudential care for self. He is also firmly convinced that home training cannot yield its best fruit except in an atmosphere of personal religion. He urges parents "to exhibit continually to the child a life devoted not to self but to the service of God (which inevitably takes the form of labouring to increase the happiness of our fellow men), combined with such teaching as shall explain the motive of such life and its hope." Without any careful analysis of the substitutes for his own very definite form of Christianity, he dismisses them as quite inadequate from the point of view of motive. "What alternative," he writes, "an agnostic parent is to adopt I confess I do not know. There appears to be no programme naturally fitted for the years when personality begins to assert itself, except the story, taught by a Society, of a personal Creator and Father, humanly revealed. Where the daily home-life presents this truth to the young they are fed by an inward happiness which lifts them on to virtue and love of their own kind and kills the workings of sin within them. When we have set ourselves patiently to understand the message we cannot wonder at its perfect congruity with the deepest needs of every child, nor fret any longer at the fact that there is no other secret of training fit to be set beside it."

FOR THE CHILDREN.

ONE PERFORMING PUPPY.

Most people who may chance to read about me here must have heard what has been said lately about performing animals, that is, animals that earn money for their masters by going through various tricks. These same tricks are sometimes very pretty, and even wonderful, so that you humans, particularly young humans, crowd to see them.

But what has been said is that performing animals are always taught by cruelty, through fear.

Now, I am such a little dog, and such a young dog, being not yet a year old, that maybe I have no right to give one single bark about this thing. And too well I know the truth—that many unhappy horses and monkeys, and dogs, not to speak of the poor bears, do suffer the most horrible ill-treatment from their owners. Why, I heard a man who loves horses tell me—well, my friend, for that's what my owner is—that he used to be very fond of going to a certain fine circus to watch the horses going through their performances. One day he asked the owner how the horses were trained.

"As far as I know, always by cruelty," was the answer. And our friend said, "This needn't be! I have had horses that would do simply anything they could to please me, once they knew it. Why, my old harness-mare would yoke herself, only for the buckles!"

"Well," said my friend, "you teach your horses by love, and for love. The circus people teach them by cruelty, and for money."

"That's it!" said the horse-lover, "the love of money is the root of all evil. But I don't go to a circus now." This is what I want to say. We dogs and other animals, too, can learn by kindness. Then we enjoy going through our performances, almost as much as you who watch us. Why, I simply swell and stiffen with pride when I am asked to go through my tricks for a visitor. But there must be a lot of patience as well as love on both sides.

Now what happened with me was this. When I was simply a blundering, awkward puppy, I managed by some strange accident to break my leg.

"Both bones!" I heard my friend say, as he carried me, most carefully, into his surgery.

Oh yes! he was very careful, but the pain! It was terrible. I moaned and howled till, as he said, the next thing would be a visit from the police.

In my agony, I caught the hand that was hurting me so dreadfully between my jaws. And if my friend has told the story once, he has twenty times, that even then I didn't bite him; even then I remembered what a kind, gentle hand it had always been.

And he understood.

"Poor Weeny Man!" he said, "you want something to chew on, don't you?" And he gave me a stick. I met my teeth through it. It was a comfort. The pain didn't seem so bad then. Bad or not, that broken leg—which by the way is as good as new now—that leg taught me what a man can be to a dog. How we love one another! I want nothing else when I have my friend. I would do anything in the world to please him. And this is how I learned to do lots of things for him, quite easily. People think them very wonderful. I don't. I want to do them. Sometimes he says, just as if he was speaking to his young brother, "I've got to go out to a patient—I wonder if any dog could find me my hat?" Off I go, and bring it.

Then, "I think my cap would be better!" and I get it, and so with his gloves, his stick, his bunch of keys. I know them all apart. I even know the Lancet from the British Medical. And I'm learning more things every day—to drill, walking on my hind legs across the room, to wipe my muddy paws on the mat—Oh, there's no end to the things he means to teach me, and that I am determined to learn, just because I love him. I know my right paw from the left; I smile when he tells me; I sing, as well as I can; and sure, the best can do no more!

Now don't, don't for a moment imagine I mean this as a defence for the hateful practice of making us animals do tricks for money, because most of what looks to you humans so amusing is starved and beaten into us. We seem clever; we are almost always cowed and terrified. But what I do want to show is the strength and beauty of the friendship that may exist between the human and the animal he owns. If this could only be realised, how much better it would be all round! The humans might get lots of fun out of it; tricks would be just pleasure, for us as well as them. And ah! what willing, eager service we would give! how happy we should be!

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

HOPE STREET CHURCH, LIVERPOOL. WELCOME TO THE REV. S. A. MELLOR.

A NUMEROUS company of members of the congregation and friends of the Hope-street Church assembled in the Yamen Restaurant, Bold-street, Liverpool, on Friday evening, May 8, for the purpose of welcoming the Rev. Stanley A. Mellor, B.A., Ph.D., who has been appointed minister of the church in succession to the Rev. H. D. Roberts. Mr. R. H. Armstrong, chairman of the committee of the church, presided, and was supported on the platform by members of the congregation and many leading Liverpool citizens, including the Lord Mayor and Sir Edward Russell, editor of the Daily Post. The chairman said he had received several letters of apology for unavoidable absence: among the writers were Mr. Walter Holland, Mrs. George Holt and Miss Holt, and Sir John Brunner. In offering a welcome to the Rev. S. A.

Mellor as their new minister he referred to the confidence with which those who had been responsible for the choice looked forward to the future. At Hope-street Church they were not numerically strong, and he could not promise their new minister at first a large congregation, but he could promise him a few devoted, self-sacrificing adherents on all occasions, of whose support and confidence any minister might be proud. He believed that Dr. Mellor would make a place for himself in the life of Liverpool which would reflect honour on himself and honour on the church.

The Lord Mayor remarked that he need hardly say that it was a very real pleasure to him to be amongst them that night, and to be able to participate in that gathering. Dr. Mellor would require all his enthusiasm and ability if he were to continue successfully the great traditions that had been established by his predecessors. He reminded them that Dr. Martineau was for many years minister of Hope-street Church, and that among his successors had been the Rev. Charles Wicksteed and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. Not only did the congregation gain much from Mr. Armstrong's vigorous personality and his sterling, rugged Christianity, if he might use the term, which seemed to impress everybody with its manliness and straightforwardness, but the whole of Liverpool was benefited by having such a man resident amongst them. Then they must not forget the Rev. H. D. Roberts, who was present that night, and whose cheery optimism they would always remember with pleasure. Speaking of the scepticism in regard to the influence of sermons which was prevalent in some quarters to-day, he remarked that if a list of the citizens who had done the greatest service for Liverpool were made, it would be found that a surprising number of them had been influenced and inspired by the sermons of the Rev. John Hamilton Thom and the Rev. Charles Beard. He hoped that these high traditions which had been established by the ministers to whom he had referred would be worthily maintained by Dr. Mellor. He concluded with a short story, and the object of his telling it would, he thought, be evident to all. There was a Scotch minister who had been recently appointed. A meeting was held to welcome him at the commencement of his ministry. There was a prayer meeting, and the different members of the congregation in offering up their prayers took an opportunity of expressing the doubts which they felt as to the particular point on which the minister might perhaps prove a little weak. So one said, "O Lord, O Lord, give him introspection," another, "O Lord, O Lord, give him true humility and meekness of spirit," or "O Lord, O Lord, give him understanding of the scriptures." This went on for a long time, until at last a sardonic voice from the back of the congregation said, "O Lord, O Lord, give him time."

Sir Edward Russell said that every generous heart must sympathise with the man who is stepping out to a great task which under high impulses he had adopted. There was, he felt, an immense value to a city in the presence of ministers of religion within it. There was too much of an idea at the present day that the best sort of ministry now was one of quiet, unostentatious and sedulous work. No one would underrate that, or think it unimportant, but they might depend upon it they also wanted leadership, distinction, imagination, and the bringing out of those doctrines and principles which were characteristic of our religion, and without which any amount of industrious devotion in smaller matters would not produce the great results which religion ought to produce. After a passing reference to the distinguished Nonconformist ministers in Liverpool when he, the speaker, settled there—Hugh McNeill, Dr. Raffles, John Kelly, Stowell Brown, Charles Birrell, John Hamilton Thom, a very little earlier Dr. Martineau, and a very little later Dr. Beard, and then Mr. Channing—Sir Edward Russell continued:—

Ordinary sentimental assurances of goodwill between persons of different denominations in this country, do not, I confess, deeply interest men. They are generally very jejune; I have known them to be somewhat insincere; at all events they are not definite enough in their treatment of differences, and in their treatment of agreement, to be of great utility. My own opinion is that every denomination in this country makes special contributions to the general stock of spiritual good. I dare say it might be possible to prove that Trinitarians could give lessons to Unitarians; I am sure it could be proved that Unitarians could give lessons to Trinitarians, Baptists, Congregationalists, Churchmen, and the Society of Friends. All these, depend upon it, have something in their essence and character which could, as it were, and may be, clubbed together for the general spiritual good of the community. If I ask myself what the Unitarians have contributed, it might make a very long story to exhaust that theme, but certainly there are three things that are self-evident. One is they have contributed a greater disposition, and a greater expansion of free thought than has been usually contributed by other denominations. Other denominations, more or less, emulate this free thought. I believe they emulate it and desire to attain it more and more every day. That will do no harm to the Unitarians, and it will do a great deal of good to all other sections of religious thought; but a far more distinct and visible and uncontroversial contribution to the common good even than that is the assertion of public ethics by the Unitarian denomination, in which they have never been excelled, or even equalled. The history of Liverpool, of Liverpool progress, and of Liverpool improvement, and the history of any avoidance of bigotry and illiberality which have been achieved by Liverpool is very largely the history of the Unitarian denomination, and that ought to be recognised by every other denomination as a distinctive and characteristic contribution to the common spiritual good of this city. The third thing is the excellence and success in domestic philanthropy. The Unitarian denomination began that in Liverpool. We know that the Domestic Mission when it was founded was an immense practical advance upon anything previously done, except in the way of ordinary religious services. The founders of that mission, and its many friends among you and your co-religionists, have been masters and teachers of the science of philanthropy in this city. Those are three very great factors on behalf of the denomination in which Dr. Mellor is going to serve, and in which we all hope he will be extremely successful. It is not too much to say that although there have been many distinguished men in connection with Hope-street Church, the traditions of that Church, at all events the modern traditions, have been set by Richard Armstrong. If ever there was a man who convinced all his fellows of the holiness of his mind, and the devotion of his heart, and the absence from his judgment of all ordinary confusions and misleadings, Richard Armstrong was the man. Like others who have impressed their fellows by their saintliness, Richard Armstrong was indeed a saint. He carried his qualities into the world around him; he dared the utmost reproach, he dared the ridicule of those among whom he lived, he confronted the fiercest opposition, and he sacrificed himself, I believe, to his best endeavours for the improvement of society in this city. In all this he had the warm sympathy of his Hope-street congregation. Dr. Mellor can hope for nothing better than to achieve some of the qualities which Mr. Armstrong achieved, and to conduct his ministry in the spirit from which Mr. Armstrong never departed, and never could depart. My own feeling is that the arrival of a really worthy minister with the capacity for eminence and leading might be described as an importation of conscience into a great community. We need conscience, every great community has a large and a valuable reserve of conscience. But that reserve of conscience is liable to diminish, not by expenditure, for the more you expend conscience and the more you use conscience the more it fructifies and reproduces itself, and the more conscience there will exist. But sometimes there are periods of lassitude and circumstances of discouragement and distraction of various follies and self-interest. If a great man comes amongst us bringing with him his own fund of conscience, and that far better and greater fund which he derives from the religion which he professes, then we go on, as it were, with a restored fund of conscience upon which we may draw as a corrective of every error, and as an inspiration and an impulse for every good. As a preacher we hear that Dr. Mellor is distinguished by great fervour. We know that that is the spirit in which we desire him to enter upon his work here, and in which, in our judgment, he will enter upon it. We also know, which is not a matter so entirely away from controversy, that he is a man who is likely to, and probably will, take a very clear line of his own on social reforms and social questions. There is a query on this, because the pulpit has not been quite made free of political or social discussion. There are a great many who believe that it will not be well that the pulpit should participate more largely than it does in such topics and such controversies. But I hold that at all events so far as the Christian conscience inspires an entrance upon this field it must be extremely useful in laying down such clear principles as are apparent to Christian minds, and in keeping up of reverent academic discussions of such points of philanthropic and social science as it is fit that Christians should consider together. If Dr. Mellor were to intrude too scientific or too economic social discussions upon his hearers, so as to disturb the balance of his preaching, I should say it would be a misfortune to Hope-street, because the first business of a minister of religion is religion; not only his first business but it is his one hope of doing any business, or any good that can possibly be done by a man in his position. We have here a man of honoured parentage, academically-educated in three countries, of zealous study, of good pulpit experience, and of social earnestness, and I say from these anticipations we may well look forward to very great ministerial success. A little bird has whispered another thing to me, and that is that Dr. Mellor has sometimes been called a revolutionary. That is a circumstance that does not seem to be regarded by Mr. Roberts otherwise than cheerfully. None of us quite like the word "Revolutionary." There is a very great difference between the adjective and the substantive. I, for one, like revolution. I am ready for a great many revolutions, and I should be very glad to see them come, and so would all of you. But when you say "revolutionary" you bring in the element of a little undue haste, and undue haste is very often accompanied with irritation, with too rapid judgment, and very often by needless offence, which unnecessarily impedes the process of convincing others. So that I like "revolution" much better than "revolutionary," and I think revolutions are much more natural in their contributions to progress than any revolutionary feeling, or any revolutionary manner. Dr. Mellor will doubtless know how to draw the line. We are all recognising with great gratitude the distinct advance that is being taken not only by your Denomination but by others in this particular line of thought and of exertion. In to-day's newspapers you have two things which—how long ago shall I say? well, I believe fifteen years ago, perhaps five years ago, could never have happened. One is the passing by the bishops, upon the motion of our own bishop, Dr. Chavasse, of a resolution in favour of the living wage. Another thing is the passing of a very similar resolution, practically identical, by the English Presbyterian Synod. I believe both those resolutions to be justified, because they do not go too far into details in matters which, very rightly, should be left to experts, but they do bring right into the front of the programme of Christian action that fact and canon of Christian duty, the extension of justice to all, and especially to the poor and to the afflicted. So that it is not necessary for Christians, however scrupulous they may be in not encroaching on the secular province, to confine themselves to charity and philanthropy of the conventional kind. They will do more both to encourage and increase philanthropy and to improve the condition of the country, if they recognise the duty of Christian principle of which many examples may be found in the teachings of Jesus Christ himself when he was on earth, the teachings of social justice, and the fruitful seed of justice in its application to human affairs. I hope most earnestly that Dr. Mellor will in every department of his work lead well amongst us as an eminent and influential Christian minister, and I hope that none the less he will show how natural and simple it is for Christianity to inspire secular affairs with the Christian spirit. He will keep religion first, there is no doubt, but he will show us that religion can lead in the march of progress, and that he can implore and probably bring out, and certainly can increase in effect, the blessing of God upon all the efforts of good men.

Further speeches of welcome were made by Sir William B. Bowring, who spoke as the oldest member of the congregation, with memories reaching back to the days when as a small child he was taken to Paradise-street Chapel, during the ministry of Dr. Martineau; by Miss McConnell, who referred to the freedom which had always marked the Hope-street pulpit, and concluded by offering a few words of special welcome to Mrs. Mellor on behalf of the ladies of the congregation; and by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, who emphasised the fact that there was work for their new minister to do, both in the particular religious sphere and also as a citizen. He admitted that sometimes it was difficult to know where to make a distinction between religion and its application; but rather overstep the line towards application than understep it, was his advice to the new minister, although he did not know that the new minister needed that advice. He looked forward to his civic work in Liverpool not merely with very great hope, but with the utmost confidence. Mr. F. W. Monks, of Warrington, brought cordial greetings from the Cairo-street congregation, in spite of the fact that the Hope-street Church had been engaged in the work of robbing them of the services of a minister whom they greatly valued. The Rev. J. Collins Odgers added a few words on behalf of the ministers of the district.

The Rev. S. A. Mellor, in the course of a short reply to all the expressions of encouragement and goodwill, said that he fully realised the high and serious character of the work to which they had called him. No one could be more alive than he to the splendid and sacred traditions of Hope-street Church. This all meant serious obligations demanding loyalty and high spiritual effort and endeavour. Hope-street Church was the home of free religion, a place set apart for the expression of the deepest personal needs of the human soul. It would be his great privilege to order their common devotional life within the church that the whisperings of eternity might be always about them, and the radiance of heaven find entrance to their lives. It had been said frequently that the labour of religion, and especially of free religion, was hard, and no doubt in many respects it was hard, but on the other hand he did not think there was ever a more favourable opportunity in the world for genuine religion than there was at that moment. Men and women needed religion, and slowly but surely they were beginning to know and to feel their need, and to know and to feel also that the need must be satisfied. Perhaps they did not feel this as yet to any great extent, but he was convinced that before many more years were over they would feel it, and they would feel it especially in those places where religion is free and unfettered, and finds its source wholly in the inner personal life.

The Lord Mayor, in proposing a vote of thanks which was accorded to the chairman, said it was a real joy and pleasure to them to see a son of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the chair that night.

MRS. BESANT AT QUEEN'S HALL. OPENING LECTURE ON MYSTICISM.

MRS. BESANT delivered the first of a series of lectures on "Mysticism" before a crowded audience at Queen's Hall on Sunday, May 17. There was no doubt, she said, that a wave of mysticism was passing over the world at the present time. Men and women everywhere were turning away from external truth towards inner realisation, and beginning to feel that an authority from within, not an authority from without, ought to be the guiding force of life. The Dean of St. Paul's statement, that "mysticism is the most scientific form of religion," was true, for mysticism, like all science, depends upon the testimony of consciousness, the only sure testimony we possess as to the facts of existence at all. Consciousness responds to the impacts made upon it by the external world by means of the senses, the emotions, and the mind, but there is another part of the consciousness which does not belong to the body or the emotions or the mind, but which yet responds to certain impressions of a kind which cannot be included in the three manifestations of consciousness just named. We have a sense of something greater than ourselves, a Presence which in our quietest, and purest, and noblest moments is more perceptible than amid the world's turmoil and unrest, and which, while it is felt to be overwhelmingly great, fills us with joy and comfort. Dimly and gropingly, as when the eye was developing in the body, the spirit in man gropes towards this supreme reality, though at first we may not realise what it means intellectually. This groping of man, and the answer to the groping, is what we mean by religion, and when we look back over the long history of the past, and find religion everywhere, in the soul of the savage as in the illuminated spirit of man at his noblest, then we realise that this testimony of the consciousness on the higher plane is as reliable as its testimony on the lower levels of sense and emotion, though it answers to another class of impressions altogether.

Mysticism, however, is not to be confused with psychism, a rather clumsy word which means the development of certain powers by which observations are carried on in the worlds of matter subtler than the physical, where impacts are made upon the consciousness to which the ordinary body is insensitive. Here we are still in the domain of the senses rather than of the spirit, and psychic phenomena no more belong to the spiritual world than the external objects we behold every day. Neither is mysticism allegory or symbolism, an intellectual process by which great truths are interpreted as St. Paul interprets them in the Epistle to the Galatians. Origen, in dealing with the Bible, speaks of the historical meaning, intended for the "carnal-minded and ignorant," then of the allegorical meaning, which a man is forced to use when he comes across absurdities that he cannot accept literally, and finally of the spiritual meaning, below the other two, which can only be understood by the spiritual man in whom God dwells. There he touches upon the realm of mysticism which lies at the basis of all that is worthy to be called knowledge. Faith you may have, and speculation you may have, but knowledge that is born of the spirit can alone, because of its identity of nature, truly know the universal Spirit whence it has come forth. Mysticism, then, is the direct knowledge of God, and of the facts of the spiritual world, which are partly embodied in religious truths given out from time to time in the history of humanity in forms suited to the time and nation and type of men who first perceived them. All religions have testified to this direct knowledge of God. Hinduism distinguishes between the lower knowledge and the knowledge of the eternal, though it excludes God from nothing, and therefore all knowledge is, in a sense, God-knowledge. Christ declared that the knowledge of God was "eternal life," a present possession, and not a future experience on the other side of death.

Mysticism, Mrs. Besant continued, also proclaims a method by which that knowledge may be obtained, but narrow is the path that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. The Roman Catholics have always kept a knowledge of this path, the end of which is called nothing less than deification—man becoming God. The Hindu and the Buddhist call it liberation from matter which has blinded us. The meaning is the same, the method the same, the end the same, and, as we study them, we realise that in the realm of the spirit there are none of those divisions that mark off religions from one another in this world of diversity. Whether in the language of the Methodist, or the great saints of the Roman Catholic Church, or of the East, the mystic asserts his direct consciousness of union with God, a reality which transcends all other certainties, and which no argument can shake nor strengthen. He does not trouble very much about the Scriptures, as the Dean of St. Paul's had pointed out, and for the same reason that is given by the Hindu, who says "The Vedas are as useful to the enlightened Brahmin as a tank in a country that is all covered with water." A man into whom the knowledge of God, the origin of all that is, is constantly flowing, has little need of the written word, and so we find that a struggle has always gone on between the priests and the mystic, the former clinging to dogma, the latter proclaiming the higher truths that lie behind them. Dogmas are necessary at a certain stage in human progress, and the priest, who has to teach the ignorant masses of men, has rightly upheld the tradition and authority of the church; but when dogmas are outgrown and become obstacles in the eternal search for truth they have to be broken. The mystic is also one who has ceased to be enslaved by the senses, the emotions, or the intellect. These he does not seek to crush or kill, but he disciplines them so that they may be subservient to the spirit, and only when the lower vehicles are thus mastered does a man begin to tread the higher path, and use his powers to help the world. Only then does he become the strongest type of man—the man who is most formidable because most powerful—the practical mystic. For him no difficulties exist, because he has the inner knowledge of God which gives him the victory. He sees God in everything, and therefore, he is content whether joy or pain comes to him, for the same great purpose lies behind both. He sees God in everyone, therefore he does not desire to control his fellow men but to draw out the divinity which is in each one of us. He is calm under all conditions, because these are but the manifestations of the indwelling Life, and because he is part of the eternal which time cannot change nor destroy. His judgment is better than the judgment of the man of the world, because it is not warped by those personal or national motives, prejudices, and desires which sway the ordinary individual. Towards this type we are all climbing, and already we realise something of its vast possibilities as we live out the truth we know.

"If you do not live out the truth you know," Mrs. Besant said in conclusion, "the higher truths will be locked to you. Never pretend to believe a truth which you are not willing to act out in the world. Let your religion be small in beliefs unless it is pregnant in action. Truth is only truth for you when you have learnt to live it, and to the man who has learnt to live one fragment of truth, Truth herself comes with open arms."

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE MEETINGS IN LIVERPOOL.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE meetings of the Liberal Christian League in Liverpool have been characterised by a certain freshness of tone and outlook, and the free mingling of divers persons and divers views has made for an unwonted buoyancy and alertness. There is room in our multifold religious and social agencies for an association which succeeds in bringing together Anglican, orthodox Nonconformist and Unitarian into friendly but frank intercourse. The programme of events was admirably drawn up, treated of living issues, and was successfully carried out both formally at the meetings and informally at the "Teatable Conferences." Pembroke Chapel hospitably housed the gatherings; and its minister, the Rev. Donald Fraser, possesses exactly the characteristics most likely to contribute to the success of these free and, from the ecclesiastical point of view, unconventional proceedings.

The work of the gathering opened on Monday afternoon with a prayer meeting, which was prefaced by some outspoken remarks by Mr. Fraser, following his custom of sincere and candid expression.

He confessed that he seldom put his prayer into words, and felt that it was rather for him an atmosphere, a mystical lying open to the Divine influences, than an explicit verbal utterance. The meeting was presided over by the Rev. A. J. Humphreys, vicar of St. Paul's, Accrington, who defended the continued verbal expression of prayer. We were, he said, in danger of losing the feeling of devotion if we lost the utterance of it. The Church of England avoided the danger of undue obtrusiveness of living personality or peculiarity by conserving the value of old, time-honoured words of prayer—the long utterance of the deepest things by the entire Church and all its disciples in the fellowship of saints. This was, he said, bringing the sacramental idea into social life: a definite focussing of the thought and spirit behind. The prayers that followed were remarkably mystical in tone, and included some beautiful aspirations. Yet probably the utterance by the Rev. A. J. Humphreys of the closing collect: Almighty God, unto whom all hearts be open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid, brought home to his hearers as seldom before the simple beauty of that age-long and submissive human cry.

The Rev. Dr. Drummond, as President of the League, preached in the evening at Pembroke Chapel. This stands in the angle of an intersection of tram lines, and the constant rumbling of cars must, one fears, have somewhat distressed the venerable preacher. His address was of that dignified, scholarly and highly spiritual description always expected from him, and always given. He dealt with the principle of liberty as related to the intellect, to the moral sphere, and to spiritual religion. Dr. Drummond was careful to show that freedom was valuable only in proportion as it caused, "the god-like qualities of the mind to be used for god-like ends, and substituted for human coercion a sense of responsibility to God." Freedom did not consist in a violent opposition to antiquity. The knock-down of traditional beliefs with an air of superiority might himself be a slave to narrowness. True freedom involved a largeness of human sympathy and treated no sincere belief, associated with man's holiest hours, with contempt.

A conference on "The Social Demands of Religion" was held on Tuesday afternoon. Mr. F. J. Marquis, of the University Settlement, emphasised the demand of modern youth for the direction of its activities in right social avenues. Youth was looking upon the old parsonic régime as a failure, and was seeking for religious spheres outside clerical control. Co-ordinated scientific treatment of the social problem was as necessary as the present medical treatment of disease. The challenge was made to the whole body of our thought. The Rev. H. D. Roberts, speaking on "Religion and the Ethics of Employing," instanced the fine work on casual labour begun by William Rathbone, carried out on the side of the employer by Mr. Lawrence D. Holt, himself of the same liberal faith. This was now in action at the Liverpool Docks. The speaker referred to the recent eight-hour agreement in the engineering and shipbuilding enterprise of the port as a result of the custom of the firm of Alfred Holt. It did not count for nothing that the President of the Steamship Owners' Federation was Mr. C. Sydney Jones, a partner in Alfred Holt, and a member of a free liberal faith. Here was definite social betterment achieved by Liberal Christians or Unitarians—the name mattered little. Mrs. Cousins, with Irish pathos and a seriousness which deprecated laughter at her own humour, dwelt on the future work of women in the churches. She pleaded for a fuller expansion of soul in the organised vehicles of religion. Miss Alleyne, Hon. Sec. of the League, described the actual work done by the League in London for mothers. The work was quite unsectarian, but spiritual food was common to all.

If a vote were taken as to the comparative popularity of addresses given, it would probably go in favour of Dr. Orchard's on Tuesday evening, on "The Significance of Jesus in Modern Life." This was marked by a passionate eloquence and original beauty of expression which could hardly fail to touch even those who did not find themselves in agreement with his intellectual positions. It was evident that he carried the bulk of his large audience with him. A faint attempt at applause at the conclusion of his last thrilling words was immediately hushed as incongruous. Dr. Orchard confessed himself an unqualified worshipper of Jesus. The modern temper, he declared, wanted this subject of the place of Jesus re-opened so that it might find the highest significance of Jesus along modern lines. There was now a passion for reality, for intelligibility; men wanted now, not merely persons' opinions, but to begin where the Apostles began, unoppressed by ancient or modern dogma. They wanted to get back to the actual experience out of which all great religion had grown. The speaker enumerated and commented upon the difficulties of the modern mind with regard to Jesus, ranging from his deification as omniscient and omnipotent to the latest assertion of his non-existence as a historical person; and showed that neither the affirmative nor the negative position satisfied. We must, he said, think out our whole problem of divinity and humanity over again. Taking a wide sweep, he reviewed the position of Jesus in history: "All history," he cried, "hinges about his name." He enumerated, with impassioned fervour, the destructions Jesus had outlived, and pictured his position in religion. "Would Unitarians say," he asked, "that the deification of Jesus had done any harm to the idea of God? Had it not brought God near to those who could not find Him in any other way? Had it not transformed personality in the most amazing way? Had it not given something to humanity it could not do without?" In a tender and vivid way he touched on the "unusual powers," the "moral glory," the "unusual consciousness penetrating other lives," the "powers of healing due to his compassion," the strange assertions not deliberately made, but, as it were, slipping out of his lips in moments of passion, like the voice of the Eternal breaking into life. He suggested the term "Sacramental" as conveying something of the significance of Jesus; the conveyance by him of something not material, so that by loving Jesus men got an experience of God. And that was what they needed. Dr. Orchard concluded by a fine peroration on Jesus as "the first person in the world," which obviously went to the hearts of many of his hearers.

The fairness and toleration of the gathering were manifested when the Rev. Dr. Rattray essayed the somewhat ungrateful task of putting the Unitarian view. He considered certain of Dr. Orchard's points, criticised some of his positions, gave his personal idea of the influence of Jesus, and concluded by thanking Dr. Orchard for his magnificent address. Mr. Fraser said he was proud to be in a place where such divergent statements were possible, while each man was respected for the sincere utterance of his inmost thoughts.

The chairman of the afternoon session on "God in Modern Thought" was the Rev. M. F. Bovenizer, an Irishman who delighted his hearers with the raciness of his appeal for "Modernity." Many people like "Antiquity" because Antiquity gives them no trouble; the God worshipped in dead forms comes near to being a "dead God." Jesus, he considered, gave his great word not to the submerged, but to the "emerging" people of his time. Dr. Mellor opened on "God in Modern Thought" from the point of view of Theoretic Philosophy. The importance of the subject was evident from the direct influence of any philosophy upon practical action. We had cast behind us the materialistic philosophy of the 19th century. Absolute idealism has now won on the theoretic field, but though we are freed from the materialistic theory we are likely to be engaged for generations in blotting out the records of materialistic practice. There is a full recognition to-day of the significance of valid personal values. The speaker quoted the statement of Dr. Ward on "Pluralism," and agreed with Dr. Ward in belief in the underlying unity. The root problem lay in the relation of God to ourselves as centres of human souls. For himself there were the two poles—the Absolute and human personalities. Here lay the ultimate paradox of life and soul. Jesus felt himself possessed of power, and also lost himself in God. Human experience assures man (as the Mystics have declared) of a sense of oneness, which floods the world with unutterable harmony. Mr. Humphreys traced the history of the conception of God in Christianity, and stated the effects of Arianism, Manichæism and Augustinianism, the Thomists, and the Scotists. There was a danger in the doctrine of Immanence, men need to supplement the Immanence by the Transcendence of God. He asserted that just as men may vary in their manifestations of themselves, so God could focus His whole being into one person—Jesus. He could not agree with Dr. Mellor as to the valid choice of any other person than Jesus as a symbol of the Supreme. But there was a Spirit-Impulse urging all men onward. Mr. Fraser trenchantly declared that he had no concern with Antiquity. No such combination as he himself, for instance, had ever occurred before in world history. Therefore, being the man he found himself, he must face these problems for himself. He believed in one Spirit, which is absolute universal Life. All that is, is God. God is the sum of all values plus x . Individuals are formal, not real. "I am God, I share in one Identity. 'Being' is absolute. Persons are but forms of expression." But the special claim made for Jesus could not be maintained.

The meeting over, private questions abounded. Why "form"? What is the method and value of "form"? At tea, the philosophers, professional and otherwise, formed the centre of stimulating and probing discussion. Some would define the absolute; others would not agree. The battle ragged, and interested knots of listeners crowded round the philosophic quarters to the detriment, possibly, of the after-tea conference, which was on the programme. Your correspondent was obliged to leave in order to make "copy"; and the exigencies of time compel him to omit any reference other than that of a postscriptum regarding the public evening meeting. For the programme and its efficient realisation the greatest credit is due to Miss Alleyne, the general secretary of the League, Mr. Capleton, the treasurer, and the local members of the League; and hearty thanks were accorded the ladies of Pembroke Chapel for their deft and genial hospitality.

At the evening meeting the Lord Mayor (Mr. Herbert Rathbone) presided, and the speakers on the subject "The Religion and the State the Age Needs," were the Rev. A. J. Humphreys, Mrs. H. D. Roberts, Mr. Lawrence D. Holt, and the Rev. M. F. Bovenizer. The attendance was almost if not quite as good as on Tuesday evening, and the speeches excellent. I am told that the after-tea conference was most vigorous. The three philosophers were heckled for an hour and a half.

THE PIONEER PREACHERS. OPENING OF THE NEW HOSTEL AT HIGHBURY.

THE new hostel for the Pioneer Preachers at 23, Highbury-place, N., was opened on Thursday afternoon, May 14, by Mr. John F. L. Brunner, M.P. Previous to the meeting friends and supporters of the movement who were present were shown over the building, which has been admirably adapted for its present purpose by Mr. Arnold Tayler, A.R.I.B.A. Several of the larger rooms on the first floor have been divided into two, thus giving a total of twelve bedrooms, all of which are furnished with extreme simplicity, and arranged so as to serve the double purpose of bedroom and study. On the same floor a small room is fitted up as a chapel, but later on it is intended to prepare a disused building at the end of the garden for this purpose. The house, which is next door but one to the home in which Mr. Joseph Chamberlain lived as a boy, faces Highbury Fields. It is said to be 150 years old, and has a pleasant garden, where the visitors on Thursday assembled for the opening ceremony, the speeches being made from the library window. The building, freehold and alterations have cost £1,340, and £150 is still required, also several articles of furniture, a list of which has been drawn up for the use of anyone who would like to have it.

The proceedings opened with the singing of a hymn, and prayer was offered by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. The President, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., who was in the chair, then gave a cordial welcome to all present. Referring to the objects of the movement for which the Pioneer Preachers stood, he said there were men who were intellectually lazy, and wished to be led in matters of religion rather than to inquire for themselves. They themselves were of a different sort, and believed that they were bound to use the reason which God had given them in all directions, as much in questions relating to religion as in politics, science, or business. Each man or woman, they felt, ought to inquire what they ought to believe, and then believe it with their whole heart and soul. At the same time, everyone must leave to others the same liberty that he claimed for himself. The present day was full of terrible perplexities and anxieties and social unrest. Would liberal Christianity help men to meet these perplexities and anxieties? He believed it would, if only it was properly understood. There were many who scoffed at Christianity who did not know anything in the world about it. It was to these that the Pioneer Preachers would address themselves. They would give to these people what they believed to be the real and true version of Christ's Gospel, first of all reading and studying for themselves, and then expounding what they had learnt, but not with any desire merely to destroy. Some things must be explained away, but at least they would never teach anything that was not true for themselves. They must get these people to listen, and teach them to believe in Christianity and assimilate it into their lives.

Mr. Brunner then declared the Hostel open, expressing his pleasure at being there to help on a movement of which he very heartily approved. He congratulated everyone concerned on the success with which their scheme had been carried out. During the year 1913, he continued, according to the report, the Pioneer Preachers conducted 400 Sunday services and 73 Sunday-school services. They held 999 week-day meetings of various kinds, and in addition 240 open-air services and meetings. This gave a total of nearly 2,000 services and meetings held during the year. They paid 1,120 home visits among members of their congregations, and 300 homes outside the congregations were systematically visited, while every fortnight church notices were distributed from house to house in their district. There were last year only six students in residence, and he could not understand how these men, who had to study as well as conduct services and visit people in their homes, could have done so much work in the time.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding, secretary, after reading a long list of names of friends who were unable to be present but sent cordial greetings, presented the report, and briefly alluded to the financial statement and to the present needs of the Hostel. In asking for some articles of furniture which were still required to make the rooms more comfortable, he wished it to be understood that there was no desire to make things too luxurious for men who must be trained to endurance, but they need not confuse endurance with physical discomfort. It had been the desire of the Society to give effect to the ideas that were in the mind of the founder of the Institution, the Rev. R. J. Campbell, and they appreciated more than anything else the interest which had always been shown in it by Mr. Campbell.

The Rev. R. J. Campbell said that it was with peculiar pleasure that he found himself a member of that gathering. The idea to which he began to give effect in 1910 had been in his mind for a number of years. He believed that there was a large untouched public which might be reached by a better type of evangelicalism than that with which most of them were familiar. It was commonly thought that the evangelical preacher must be a less highly trained man than the preacher in the pulpit, but almost the reverse should be the case. Too much rested upon the shoulders of the average minister at present. He was the president of a small republic—his energies were so greatly overtaxed that he had little time for quiet study and preparation. This was not good for the minister, nor did it tend to raise the quality of his preaching, therefore they needed a band of men who were free to go, if necessary, through the length and breadth of the land with a liberal evangel. He thought four years ago that there was an opening for this kind of work, and events had proved that he was right. But his idea was not original. The pioneer of it, he believed, was Professor Eliot, of Harvard, who, soon after the Pioneer Preachers were established, sent a message congratulating him on realising one of his dreams, and it had been adumbrated also by Professor Jacks. The Pioneer Preachers formed a delightful little community, continued Mr. Campbell. They had frankly taken a leaf out of the Roman Catholic's book, and why not? It was a good thing to have the community life. When a few years ago he was warned that he must sever himself from all outside societies and save his health for his work as minister of the City Temple, the step he found hardest to take was separating himself from the Pioneer Preachers. In effect he had not done so, although he had since that time had the joy of seeing other people doing the work.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

MR. FRANK ROSCOE, who has kindly agreed to give the annual meeting paper for the Sunday School Association on Tuesday, June 2, was formerly in charge of the University Training College at Oxford, and until recently of the one at Birmingham. His splendid work for education in Birmingham is well known. He was a member of the Education Committee and also president of the Birmingham Debating Society and the Birmingham Shakespeare Club. Mr. Roscoe possesses that rare faculty of making his subject clear and attractive not merely to the members of the profession, but also to those who are only teachers on occasion, and to the general public. Sunday-school teachers may be sure that they will go away from this lecture feeling indeed the importance and the difficulty of the art of teaching, but also that they have learned in countless ways how to overcome those difficulties. He has had much experience in lecturing to Sunday-school teachers, and carried out at Birmingham successfully an experiment of which the organisers and he himself may well be proud.

In 1909 he was invited by the Sunday School Forward Movements Committee, a committee representing all shades of religious opinion, to lecture to Sunday-school teachers on "The Art and Method of Teaching." The lectures were an unqualified success in every way. The course was repeated, and still many were disappointed in not being able to secure tickets. Other courses of lectures followed, and it was found that Mr. Roscoe's ability to deal with the question could not be over-rated. He not only theorised, but had classes of children before his audiences, giving practical demonstration of the subject matter of the lectures. His confident eloquence captivated all who heard him. He has also lectured to Sunday-school teachers in Nottingham and Derby. It is hoped that the delegates to the Whit-week meetings will take full advantage of this opportunity, and that the teachers from the London schools will make a point of attending so as to qualify themselves for their sacred work.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Ballyhemlin : The late James McCullough.

On Sunday, May 17, the funeral took place of Mr. James McCullough, the aged sexton of Ballyhemlin Meeting House, when a large number of people attended to pay tribute to the memory of a simple, quiet, good life. The first part of the service was held in the Meeting House, the funeral taking place in the ancient cemetery of Ballyhalbert, close to the seashore, two miles away.

Cambridge.—The Sunday morning services at Cambridge, begun in 1904, and held during the University terms in the Assembly Hall, Downing-street, are being conducted this month by the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., who for many years was minister at Ann Arbor and other University centres in America. The Rev. E. W. Lummis, who had been in charge of the movement since 1910, resigned in April owing to his retirement from the Unitarian ministry. The Rev. Dr. Carpenter will preach at Cambridge on Sunday, June 7.

Horsham.—A lecture on "Matthew Caffyn" was given in connection with the Book Society of the Free Christian Church on Wednesday evening, May 13, by Miss E. Kensett. The chair was taken by Mr. J. B. Price, who is one, among many, of Matthew Caffyn's surviving descendants. The main facts in the life of this hero of Commonwealth times were recorded. The bi-centenary of Matthew Caffyn's death, after a pastorate of nearly 70 years, occurs this year, as does also the centenary of John Dendys, and it has been decided to renovate the organ and rebuild the Haylor cottages in commemoration of these events. The Treasurer is appealing for help towards both these objects. The committee will be especially glad to welcome a large number of friends from a distance to their forthcoming Whitsunday anniversary.

Leeds : Mill Hill Chapel.—On the morning of the 17th inst. (Empire Sunday), the Rev. R. Nicol Cross, M.A., preached on "Empire : What is it ?" He introduced the word and the theme because there was some need that the qualities of "Empire" should be invested with their highest aims and interests; that a great word should be rescued from the degradation in which it was sometimes nearly smothered. Their Empire, in the sense in which he used the word, was the overflow of their people, the fruit of their vitality spreading into all quarters of the earth. Let them recollect that had only been possible by their having more vitality than they could find a theatre for in these little islands. Therefore the time was ripe for asking what sort of people were they filling the world with? Did they remember that what they were the emigrants who populated that same Empire were or would be? Were they worthy of their mission? To redeem their land, to save it for the highest, was to go a long way towards saving the world. The Empire was not land nor territory, but just souls, not to be measured by area but by achievement. It consisted of all on whom the nation stamped its own mind and personality. He did not understand those who told them that the Empires of Greece and Rome had passed away into ruins. Had the Empires which those races set up really vanished? Surely not the Empires of thought and feeling, of law, poetry, and art? Those were the true Empires, and there were no others. These great Empires were still stamping their culture on the modern world. So for Britain. When all their military splendour had vanished on land and been blotted out on sea, this country would still live and conquer through its writers and its poets.

London : Deptford.—On Sunday afternoon last, the 17th inst., over 125 of the Deptford scholars attended a united service at Lewisham, in response to the kind invitation of Mr. Pope. The elder children assembled in the Deptford Church, and marched in procession to Lewisham, headed by the Boy Scouts, with their drums and bugles. Most interesting addresses were given by Mr. E. A. Carlier, Mr. Pope, and a Lewisham Church member respectively, while the hearty singing of the hymns proved a feature worthy of special notice.

London : Hampstead.—The Rev. Henry Gow, who has recently been appointed vice-chairman of the Hampstead Board of Guardians, after serving four years as chairman, was cordially thanked for his services at the last fortnightly meeting of the Board. Mr. E. S. Payne, the new chairman, said that during the past four years they had been presided over by a gentleman of great ability, and he thought it was due to Mr. Gow that he (the chairman) should say publicly, what they had all been saying privately, that he had done most excellent work in that room for the parish, and that at a time when there had been a considerable amount of movement, to say the least, in Poor Law affairs—he would go further, and say that there had been a considerable amount of development—they had been ably guided by Mr. Gow. He would like also to say (what had been to them a source of great satisfaction) that in social affairs, for which Hampstead was pretty well famous, Mr. Gow had represented them in a most creditable manner. He recollected being at a meeting of the Hampstead Council of Social Welfare recently at which Mr. Gow made a most excellent speech, one of those speeches which, while they praised, also discriminated in a way which men of less courage would not care to do. During Mr. Gow's chairmanship they had not had a disturbance of any kind, nor any difficulty with any of the applicants who appeared before them. None of them had ever left that room in dudgeon or with a grievance. In all those matters Mr. Gow had been a most excellent chairman. He deserved their sincerest thanks, and he (Mr. Payne) was only too pleased to say that he, for one, was very thankful that they would continue to have the services and advice of Mr. Gow. He moved that their sincerest thanks be given to Mr. Gow. Colonel Sheffield seconded the motion, and it was warmly supported by every gentleman member of the Board present, each one paying an earnest tribute to Mr. Gow's work. Mr. Preston also expressed thanks on behalf of the staff for Mr. Gow's unvarying kindness and courtesy to them. The motion was carried with acclamation, the Board standing. The Rev. H. Gow said the motion was absolutely unexpected, and very overwhelming. It was perfectly impossible for him to make any kind of adequate response for the most kind, he ventured to say affectionate words, that could only come from a kindness of heart which overlooked many disabilities of which he was most conscious. Looking back on the last four years, generally speaking, he felt that the office of chairman was one of hard work, but it was very interesting, and it had been on the whole a very happy time. He would always look back upon it with feelings of gratitude to all the members of the Board and the officers. The more he worked with them the more he had a deepening affection and respect for every member. He thanked Mr. Payne especially for his gracious and kind words.

London : Islington.—On May 14, in the lecture hall of Unity Church, Islington, Dr. Tudor Jones delivered the last of a long and interesting course of lectures on the "Philosophy of Religion." During the winter Dr. Jones has delivered two courses, one on the "English Thinkers and Teachers of the Nineteenth Century," and the other on a book of his own, "The Interpretation of Eucken's Philosophy." These classes have been remarkably well attended, and a good average attendance has been maintained during the two entire courses, though consisting of no less than 30 lectures. After the close of the lecture a social gathering took place, and a well-attended meeting was held, over which the Rev. D. Davis presided. The chairman said that in all his experience of educational lectures he had never met anything which surprised him so much as the large and regular attendances at Dr. Jones' lectures on philosophy. Every member in the class felt deeply indebted to Dr. Jones for his devotion and the great labour which he expended in the preparation and delivery of these lectures, and there was a deep and unanimous feeling that there should be an expression in some form of gratitude for his labours. One of the lady members, Mrs. Bull, in presenting to Dr. Jones an important volume, "Essays on Truth and Reality," by F. H. Bradley, said the book was a small token, in which all joined, of gratitude and appreciation. Mr. Stuart testified to the excellence of the work done by Dr. Jones, and to his clear, instructive and pleasant manner in dealing with matters usually felt to be so difficult and uninviting. Miss Pesci, the secretary of the society, and Mr. Chalk expressed their high appreciation of the lectures. Dr. Jones acknowledged the compliment paid to him, and said he felt himself amply repaid for his services, and was highly gratified by the many hearty acknowledgments made to him. Miss Giddens and Miss Waters each contributed to the pleasure of the evening by their singing.

Rawtenstall.—Sunday school anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 10, the preacher being the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, of Birkenhead. The collection realised £47.

Stockton-on-Tees.—A quarterly meeting was held in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Church on Wednesday, May 6, when encouraging reports were presented by the Treasurer and Secretary. During the evening a presentation was made to the ex-treasurer, Mr. W. J. Watson, J.P., by Mr. T. H. Wright, on behalf of the subscribers, as a sign of their appreciation of his valuable services during the past 32 years in the offices of treasurer, secretary, and chairman of the Church Committee. Mr. Watson, in replying, said that his work for the church had been one of love, and it was only his advanced years and necessarily less robust health that made him wish to be relieved of the office which it had been so great a personal pleasure to him to fill.

Taunton.—Mr. George S. Woods, of Manchester College, Oxford, has received and accepted an invitation to become minister of the Mary-street Chapel.

West Bromwich.—On Sunday, May 17, the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Lodge-road Unitarian Church, and the 39th anniversary of the opening of the building itself, was celebrated by the re-opening of the church, which has been closed for a considerable period for the purpose of renovation and redecoration. A new heating apparatus, a new system of ventilation, and the electric light have been installed, the organ improved, and alterations made in connection with the schools, the whole necessitating an expenditure of nearly £600, which has been raised by the generous help of many friends and the efforts of the congregation. The Rev. F. A. Homer, minister, preached morning and evening, and in the course of his sermon at the morning service pleaded for a broader and wider conception of Christianity among all sections of the Christian Church. On Monday an entertainment was given by the Lodge-road Dramatic Society in aid of the West Bromwich, Oldbury and District Branch of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A UNITARIAN HYMNIST.

In his address at the funeral service of the late Silvester Horne, Principal Forsyth quoted from some verses which had been found among Mr. Horne's papers in his own handwriting, though there was nothing to show whether he had himself composed them or not. The last verse ran:

I know not what beyond may lie,
But look in humble faith
Into a larger life to die—
And find new birth in death.

In reference to this the Rev. W. G. Tarrant writes to the Daily News and Leader as follows: "It is evident from the verse quoted by Principal Forsyth at the funeral of the Rev. C. Silvester Horne that the manuscript in which it was found was a copy of a hymn by the Rev. Frederick Lucian Hosmer, an American Unitarian writer. The hymn, as it appears in Unitarian hymnals, begins, 'I little see, I little know, yet can I fear no ill.' Mr. Hosmer, who was born in 1840, is undoubtedly the greatest living hymnist among the Unitarians. Over twenty of his hymns will be found in the Rev. John Hunter's collection, 'Hymns of Faith and Life' (1896), including the poem referred to."

A MINISTRY OF HEALTH.

Increasing attention is being given to the needs and rights of the mother, no less than to those of the child, whom Bernard Shaw describes in his recently published treatise as "an experiment, a fresh attempt to produce the just man made perfect: that is, to make humanity divine." At a conference held under the auspices of the National Committee for the Prevention of Destitution, over which Mrs. Sidney Webb presided, the need of a greater recognition by the State of the importance of motherhood was urged by many speakers, and Miss Margaret Bondfield (Women's Co-operative Guild) said that a progressive and enlightened Government department was needed, a Ministry of Health, in which there should be a special department to deal with maternity and infant life, with a woman at the head, staffed by women, and served by a number of qualified women inspectors. Dr. Saleeby, who has just published a book on "The Progress of Eugenics," spoke strongly on the necessity for protecting the child from the racial poison to which so many ills in early life can be traced, and the question of the need for baby clinics was discussed at the afternoon session, papers being read by Dr. Ethel Bentham and Dr. Helen Campbell.

THE BODLEIAN LIBRARY.

The curators of the Bodleian Library are appealing for a capital sum of £50,000 for the purpose of increasing their income by £2,000 a year more than it is at present, without which, they warn us, they will be obliged to enter upon a course of drastic retrenchment which will curtail the usefulness of the library and impair its reputation. There is, they point out, no surplus for expenditure upon the purchase of MSS., foreign books and periodicals, nor of such English publications as do not come into the library under the Copyright Act. Money is also required for the completion and printing of the catalogue, and for furnishing with book-cases the new underground bookstore. Mr. Asquith, Lord Salisbury, Lord Milner, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, and Sir W. R. Anson, the trustees of the Oxford University Endowment Fund, with the concurrence of the Archbishop of York, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Halsbury, Lord Morley, and Lord Bryce, on behalf of the Bodleian Library, call attention to the appeal. Donations should be sent to the Librarian, or to the Secretary of the Oxford Endowment Fund, 49, Sloane-square, S.W.

RELICS OF JOHN WESLEY.

A collection of Wesleyana, formed by the late Mr. Joseph G. Wright, of Bourne-mouth, has recently been sold. According to Public Opinion, the most important Wesley material lies at the Wesleyan Conference offices in the City-road, where there are the diaries, letters, and other manuscripts, and much is also possessed by the Drew College in America, which recently acquired by purchase all that had been gathered by the late Mr. R. Thursfield Smith, of Whitechurch, Shropshire. A good many private collections are also in existence, those, for example, of Mr. Hendrix in America, and Mr. Stampe, of Grimsby, and that made by the late Mr. Richard Green, Governor of Didsbury College, which is still intact. Mr. Wright's collection was composed largely of portraits, and in one "lot" alone there were 450 engraved portraits, including practically a complete series of John Wesley's. This brought £42. Another "lot," comprising sixteen autograph letters of John Wesley, besides several of Charles and other members of the family, went to the same purchaser.

THE FIGHT FOR THE BIRDS.

The Humanitarian, commenting on recent discussions about the plumage Bill, says: "We were amused to see a recent remark in the Press that the passage of the Bill would give satisfaction to Mr. Galsworthy. It will give well-deserved satisfaction not only to Mr. Galsworthy, but to other persons who have worked for it, and where a result is obtained by the labours of many minds this tendency to lionise one individual is rather ludicrous. In the present instance it is peculiarly so; for, as a matter of fact, if the personal question must be raised at all, it is quite certain that the man who has done most for the passage of a Plumage Bill (and for a better Bill than the present one) is Mr. James Buckland. Nothing, we are sure, has been finer, in the history of the humanitarian movement, than the way in which Mr. and Mrs. Buckland have forced this question to the front, and while we fully congratulate everyone concerned, it is they who (next to the birds themselves) will have our first and warmest congratulations."

THE THEISTIC ENDEAVOUR SOCIETY.

Two new pamphlets have just reached us, "Some Aspects of a Moral Life," and "Awake! Arise!" an address to the young men of India by Mr. Satis Chandra Chakravarti, published by the Theistic Endeavour Society in Madras. This Society, which was nominally started in 1912, but did not begin its definite work till August, 1913, is doing good work for the moral and spiritual well-being of young men and students by organising lectures and debates, holding religious services, and aiding in every possible way the spread of liberal ideas on theology and social relations. It has established a home at Madras which is gradually becoming a centre for undenominational and educational activities, has begun to form a library, attached to which is a free reading room, and started a publishing section which issues monthly such tracts as those above-mentioned for free distribution among earnest inquirers. In addition to all this, efforts are made to give financial help to families rendered destitute by the death of a member, and to deserving students, especially in cases where some suffering has been entailed by conscientious adherence to the principles of a liberal faith instead of the commonly accepted religious dogmas. Mission work, naturally, forms a great part of the Society's activities, and special days of national importance are marked by suitable functions, such as Nagar Sankirtan, preaching in the open air, and public meetings.

Correct solutions have been received from E. Wright, W. T. M. (Sunderland), Rev. B. C. Constable, A. Mielziner, F. S. M. (Mayfield), E. W. E. (Finchley), W. E. Arkell, Geo. Ingledew, H. T. (Belfast). Of No. 55 from W. T. M. (Sunderland) and E. W. E. (Finchley).

In reference to my note on No. 56 last week, I made a clerical error in stating the omission of a black P at QR3—I should have said KR3. Without the latter, there would be two solutions besides the author's, viz.: B. Kt6 and B. Kt5, ch!

Our No. 58 won premier honours in a monthly competition instituted by an American problem pamphlet called "The Problem," which caters exclusively for problemists. It is quite an innovation in chess journalism, and is the official organ of a club of problem-composers of all nationalities. I was invited to contribute to its pages, and secured first

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE debate on the Weekly Rest Day Bill last week revealed many cross-currents of opinion in the House of Commons. Ultimately the Bill was rejected by a majority of twelve. Probably this result was due largely to faults in drafting and the curious schedule of exemptions, which offered many points for attack. Mr. W. H. Dickinson, who seconded the motion for its adoption, said he did so for utilitarian rather than Sabbatarian reasons. In his opinion, it was justified by human need. As the democracy grew in power it was more and more desirous of insisting that a weekly rest day should be assured to them, and the Bill would thus meet a popular demand. He proceeded to criticise shipowners, as among the greatest offenders in the matter of Sunday labour.

* * *

MR. ELLIS GRIFFITH, speaking on behalf of the Government, referred with approval to the two principles contained in the Bill, one that there must be a day of rest in seven, and the other that the normal day should be Sunday; but he said that he could only give his vote for the second reading if the supporters of the measure were willing to refer it to a Select Committee for inquiry and report. We regret very much that this suggestion was not accepted. The growth of Sunday labour in our great cities is on a scale to fill people with any power of imagination with grave alarm. Continually more and more men are drawn in to satisfy new demands of pleasure and luxury, while the speeding up of business has made the docks and the railways busier than they ever were before. We believe that we are right in saying that the lift-men in the London tubes, who work long and exhausting hours on Sunday, do not get a whole day off every week; and they are simply typical of masses of labour all over the country. Whatever happens we must insist on the weekly rest-day for all as an elementary human right. Anything else means physical deterioration and moral disaster.

THE game of ecclesiastical diplomacy which is being played between the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church is becoming so protracted that public interest in it has grown rather languid. The General Assemblies of both churches came to the formal decision on Monday to go on with the negotiations; but the debates revealed strong elements of opposition on questions of principle. It is hard to see how any new formula is to be found which will emphasise the State connection and at the same time secure complete spiritual freedom. At the United Free Church Assembly, Dr. Whitelaw, of Kilmarnock, moved an amendment, which was lost, to the effect that the Assembly reappoint the Committee, instructing it to make clear to the Church of Scotland Committee that any plan of union, to be just and satisfactory to the United Free Church, must provide not only for the complete spiritual freedom of the Church, but also for the equality of all Churches before the civil law. Perhaps the words were too blunt and decisive for an atmosphere of negotiation, but they reveal the essential difficulty of modifying traditional arrangements in the modern State without relinquishing the principle of establishment altogether.

THE annual report of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children was presented to the Council meeting on Tuesday. It is, as usual, a record of hard and unflagging work, controlled by consummate patience and skill, to mitigate terrible wrong and remove one of the foulest blots upon our civilisation. In the year covered by the report the number of cases dealt with was 54,772. Prosecutions were instituted in 2,349 cases, and only 51, or 2·2 per cent., were dismissed for lack of evidence. Unfortunately the cases of neglect and starvation were more numerous than in any previous year. On the other hand, actual cruelty and brutality has decreased, and the Society may take no small share of the credit for this happy result. Twenty years ago, out of a total of 15,679 complaints, there were 3,283 coming under the description of ill-treatment and assault, or 20·9 per cent. Last year, with 54,772 complaints, the cruelty of violence was confined to 3,991 cases, or 7·3 per cent.

In his Ascension Day sermon Dean Inge spoke very plainly of the failure of the traditional teaching about heaven and the hereafter to appeal to the modern mind. Heaven, he said, had been too often pictured by Christians in such a way as to deprive it of its religious and spiritual value. Many Christians were far too materialistic in their religion, and they tried to make heaven a geographical expression and to put Eternity within the framework of Time. Eternity for them was simply an endless succession of moments, a series slipped off at one end and not at the other. In that second edition of the world in space all the injustice of the first edition was to be rectified and the righteous were to enjoy themselves in a more refined way. If they put their beliefs in such a crude and materialistic form they were little better than a fairy tale. But the average man thought for himself, and wanted to know what evidence there was for the existence of such a place, and he knew enough astronomy to feel the absurdity of placing it either inside or outside the solar system. Many of the clergy were perplexed themselves, and said as little about Heaven as they decently could. The time had gone by when people were best taught by gaudy coloured dogmatic picture-books. They would rather the clergy said that they did not know than have crude symbols given as literal facts.

AN important criticism of the recent report of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service so far as it affects the employment of women has been issued by the committee of the Association of Head Mistresses. "We gladly welcome," they say, "some of the recommendations of the Commission in regard to this important matter. We recognise that the suggestions of a special inquiry as to the higher posts in the service suitable to women; of the appointment of women on the staffs of the Civil Service Commission and of the national museums and libraries; of the elimination of the girl clerk and of some improvements in the salaries of women typists, mark a distinct advance on the treatment hitherto accorded to women in the service. We are, moreover, glad to see that some recognition is given to the principle of equal pay for equal work in the cases of men and women, that it is admitted that the Civil Service examinations should be adapted to the education given in our secondary schools, and that an important minority of the Commissioners advocate the appointment of a woman on the staff of the proposed new section of the Treasury."

ON the other hand, the committee express their deep regret that the majority of the Commissioners should have committed themselves to general statements regarding the work of women, which are unsupported by the mass of evidence based on direct experience. They deplore the recommendation that the present segregation of men and women in Government offices should be continued, as contrary to the practice of modern universities, of many Government offices in other countries, and of many great houses of business, as unduly restricting employment, and as tending to withhold from women the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the whole routine of a department. Further, the committee deplore the failure to recommend any admission of women to higher posts in the Civil Service by the Class I. examination. "No reason," they say, "is assigned for this, and we feel that the entrance of women to the higher posts through selection only is open to grave and regrettable accusations of favouritism, and will tend to bar women already in the service from promotion to high administrative posts. We do not hold that competitive examination is the only, or even the best, method of appointment to responsible posts. But so long as it remains the usual rule for men we believe that public opinion will be justified in disapproving differential treatment for women candidates."

THERE will no doubt be some adverse criticism in orthodox circles of the Dean of St. Paul's, when he delivers the Essex Hall Lecture next week. But his acceptance of the invitation is just what might have been expected from a man of his strength and independence of mind. As a scholar he knows that knowledge on religious subjects is not confined in denominational compartments. As a broad-minded Christian he can recognise common interests and aims amid diversities of ritual and belief. It is quite time that the rather stupid boycott of Unitarians should be brought to an end. Three-fourths of it is a concession to ignorant prejudice and rests on no clear principle. The vast area of modern scholarship is common ground. The practical aims of religion as expressed in worship and character and the service of human need impart a common spiritual quality to life. Men of open mind recognise no closed territories in which they are forbidden to wander lest they should incur the taint of heresy or forfeit the Christian name. All this makes for co-operation and friendship and cordial mutual respect, and is gradually enlarging the area where the edicts of the orthodox censor and the denominational wire-puller cease to run.

* * *

It always seems to us singularly fatuous and short-sighted that a teacher of religion should allow himself to be debarred from fresh opportunities of speaking his word on account of what other people may possibly think or say about him. The true man ought to feel at home in any company, where no restriction except that of considerateness and good manners is placed upon his freedom of speech. It would have fared ill with early Christianity if St. Paul had refused to address the Stoics and Epicureans and mingle freely with them in common debate, for the same reasons which keep many orthodox Churchmen closely confined to their own set at the present day. Even men of liberal opinions hesitate sometimes to appear on agnostic or secular platforms lest their action should be misunderstood. A man of robust faith accepts misunderstanding as part of the risk of being alive and does these things quite naturally, without a touch of self-consciousness or bravado.

THE DAY OF PENTECOST.

THE Day of Pentecost is the festival of religious experience. In this sense it is the day in the Christian calendar which makes the most direct appeal to the modern mind. Whatever difficulties the strange narrative in the Book of Acts may present to us, its inner significance is clear. It marks the moment of complete consciousness that God is dwelling in the soul. It was the fire of love in the heart. It was power from on high entering in and taking possession of human lives. It was the recovery of daily companionship with CHRIST, no longer in his bodily presence, but as a spirit within, over which time and death have no power. In other words, it was experience, so direct and convincing that everything else paled into insignificance before it; and it is the authentic note of experience which makes it one of the supreme moments in the spiritual history of the race.

For at that moment the first disciples bridged the gulf between the outer and the inner world, and linked history and personal experience in inseparable unity. For us, more reflective and less inspired, the gulf remains. Through the Christian centuries men have oscillated uncertainly between trust in recorded facts and confidence in the inner light, and have seldom found themselves able to do equal justice to both. At the present time the prevailing emphasis upon experience is due, in no small degree, to the spirit of criticism and denial which has invaded the whole domain of history. It is impossible, so we argue, that God's dealings with the soul can depend in any way upon the doubtful records of the past. What can events, which took place two thousand years ago, and which, at the best, we only dimly apprehend, have to do with the immediate action of the HOLY SPIRIT upon our own hearts? It seems to be logically necessary, even when we can claim no very original insight of our own, to throw history to the winds, and to make every soul an independent centre of inward illumination. The spiritual life is thus detached from its ancestry and surroundings, and personal emotion tends to grow in vagueness as it loses the richness of colour and clearness of aim which are stamped upon religion by corporate memories and loyalty to a common spirit.

We have here touched upon one of the most difficult problems of modern religion.

Probably, in their effort to recover the reality of experience, men will go even further than they have done already in revolt against the association of religion with records and memorials of the past. But they cannot travel very far in this direction without discovering that the only way of salvation is to bring history and personal life into close alliance once again. The attempt to divorce them can only produce a deep schism in the soul. It is not only the fact that history supplies much of the most valuable material upon which emotion has to work; it is also the chief means at our disposal for the discipline of feeling and its guidance into fruitful channels. The vague response of the heart to the invitations of truth and loveliness is something quite different from the devotion of the conscience to the standards of Christian goodness. The one hovers continually upon the border-line of sentimentalism and is compatible with much idle dreaming and self-indulgence; the other consumes the base things of character in its fervent heat and concentrates the whole force of its illuminated moments upon urgent practical tasks. This is the deeply significant thing about the experience of Pentecost. Just at the moment when the word and memory of CHRIST were beginning to slip away into the irrecoverable past, it gave them back to the heart with quickening power; and henceforth they could never seem distant or strange, for they were within, a redeeming energy of love, which changed the whole personality and made men good in the very definite sense in which Christianity uses the word goodness.

It is this experience which is repeated from age to age. The Christian generations are linked each to each and all to God by this intimate mingling of what is personal and historical. The fact that things happened long ago is no hindrance to an immediacy of spiritual appeal, which annuls all barriers of time and place. The truth that the HOLY SPIRIT is always with us as our teacher and guide in no way cancels our dependence upon the things of CHRIST. To the simple heart it all seems so natural that there is no problem or difficulty at all. In his recent Swarthmore Lecture on the Historic and the Inward CHRIST, Mr. EDWARD GRUBB quotes the following passage from one of the early companions of GEORGE FOX:

"And this I declare to all the inhabitants of England, and all that dwell upon the earth, that God alone is the Teacher of his people, and hath given to everyone a measure of Grace, which is the Light that comes from CHRIST. . . . And this I witness to all the sons of men, that the knowledge of Eternal Life I came not to by the letter of Scripture, nor hearing men speak of the name of God; I came to the true knowledge of the Scripture, and the eternal rest, by the inspiration of the Spirit of JESUS CHRIST."

This confession of Christian experience, at once personal and general, in which there is no sense of conflict between private insight and the language of historical religion, expresses with unusual directness the lesson of the Day of Pentecost which we chiefly need amid our present religious discontents.

RELIGION AND THE SUPERNORMAL.

III.

THE next division of the psychic which claims our attention is that which includes the phenomena of clairvoyance and telepathy. These are distinguished from spiritualism and all forms of mental control by the fact that their manifestations are not entirely dependent upon the human will. We either see with some inward vision people and events which are invisible to the bodily sight, or we do not see them. We either feel that which is afar (the real significance of the word telepathy), or we do not feel it. The greater part of mankind do not possess these powers at all, but those who do cannot wholly ignore them, any more than we ordinary people can ignore the messages brought us, whether we will or no, by the medium of the five normal senses. Clairvoyance, however, is not always beyond the control of the will. It often needs such aids as the handling of external objects, crystal-gazing, or the induction of the trance-state, to set it, as it were, in motion, and thus lays itself open to all the dangers of a special cult. It is one of the weaknesses of human nature that curiosity about the future is often strong enough to over-ride worthier instincts. Hence, it comes about that there is no branch of the psychic which has been subjected to such diligent cultivation, supplemented by so much fraud, and, one may add, prostituted to such base uses. The evil that is wrought by the unscrupulous use of this power upon foolish and susceptible people, from the ignorant nursery-maid who submits her hand to the old gypsy woman, to the fashionable lady who frequents the consulting room of the latest society fortune-teller, is too patent to need emphasising. We have seen the danger of cultivating these powers for their own sake, and are more concerned with the type of clairvoyance—or clairaudience—which asserts itself irrespective of the will of the owner, making him possessed of knowledge which, perhaps, he would prefer to be without by what sometimes appears to him a backstairs method savouring of dishonour. Should he try to turn this knowledge to any account, either for himself or others? Or should he treat it with inviolate secrecy, as he would a private conversation inadvertently overheard? In a word, should he regard it as a gift of God or a gift of the devil?

The problem which faces the clairvoyant who would fain bring his "second sight" into harmony with his religion is no easy one. A friend who, from the time she was a young girl, has been conscious of this power to an extraordinary degree, tells me that, in meeting strangers, so much knowledge of their most intimate concerns crowds in upon her that she feels it to be unlawful to admit it, and has to force it back, as it were, from the threshold of her consciousness by concentrating her mind on other things. Only in the case of her own friends, where it seems likely that some definite good may be accomplished through her knowledge, does she deliberately work upon it. This is a sound principle, but how enormously complicated does life become, and how overwhelming its temptations to one so gifted! Indeed, one is tempted to think that only the saints of the earth should be entrusted with a power so vast. For they alone live in the constant realisation of a pull in another direction sufficiently strong to prevent their being drawn into by-paths (which too often turn out to be blind alleys), in obedience to the insistence of the psychic.

Let us glance for a moment at the way in which Christ and his closest followers have used this power—for all the saints seem to have possessed and employed it. The fact that they have done so, and the teaching of Christ, both explicit and implicit, sufficiently disposes of the suggestion that its source is evil.

To take but one instance from the Gospels: we are told that Jesus betrayed a knowledge of Nathaniel and his doings, which could not have been obtained by the ordinary channels. (John i. 48.) But the tendency to gape at this as a marvel, and regard it as a proof of Messiahship, is immediately checked. "Because I said unto thee, 'I saw thee under the fig tree,' believest thou? Thou shalt see greater things than these." The teaching of Christ invariably points us on to something higher than mere vulgar wonder-working, and discourages on every occasion the eagerness of men to make psychic manifestations the ground of faith.

Of St. Francis of Assisi his biographers record numerous instances of clairvoyant power, which are too much of a piece with our increased knowledge of the psychic to be readily discredited. "He seemed," says St. Bonaventura, "to have approached unto the mirror of eternal light to gaze therein; and by its wondrous radiance the sight of his mind surely perceived things that were absent in bodily form, even as though they were present." His gift, however, though he accepted and used it as simply and naturally as he did all the other great things that came to him, was a source of perplexity, even to him, and we find him on one occasion "groaning bitterly" in the struggle to decide whether or not to reveal that which he had seen.

To sum up, then, we must conclude, even more emphatically than in the case of mental control, that in any way to isolate clairvoyant power, or deliberately to seek it out, is harmful to both subject and object. To submit oneself to even the most highly principled clairvoyant is a proceeding fraught with danger to the spiritual life, because it tampers with the sacredness of free will; whilst those who exercise their power over others to any considerable extent expose themselves to dangers so subtle that few are able entirely to withstand them. The secret of using such gifts sanely and wisely lies, for the Christian, in thinking about them as little as possible. And this is only to be achieved by having a mind so set upon the advancement of the kingdom that all other considerations are simply crowded out until they, too, can be used to help forward the great consummation.

Turning now to the consideration of that most potent of psychic forces, telepathy, we are immediately conscious of a subtle difference between it and the other phenomena we have dealt with. Unlike clairvoyance, it is wholly, not merely partially, independent of the will. And it possesses a spiritual quality which lifts it above the plane where such abuses as we have been considering are possible. Indeed, whereas it has been somewhat of a problem to fit mental healing, clairvoyance, and the rest into their right places in the religious life, telepathy seems to find its niche at once—and that not far from the heart of Christianity. For it is nearly allied to love, and cannot manifest itself at all in natures which are cold and self-contained, and lack the warm, living sympathy necessary to throw themselves into other people's lives. Maternal love, the most self-forgetful of all, is often telepathic; and numerous instances are on record in which mothers have known of danger or death approaching their far-away children at the very moment of the crisis. But this intuitive knowledge of events in the lives, and even of thoughts in the minds, of those who are dear to us is really the culminating point in a sympathy so intense that it triumphs over barriers of time and space. Christ and his followers alike were wont to disconcert their disciples by replying to their unspoken thoughts. In Mark ix. we are told how, the disciples having been disputing among themselves by the way as to who should be the greatest, the Master, when they had arrived at their destination, questioned them as to the subject of their conversation. Their somewhat guilty and crestfallen silence is met by the startling words, "If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all and servant of all." And in the Legend of St. Bonaventura we have the charming story of how St. Francis, worn out and weary, returning from a long journey with Brother Leonard of Assisi, was riding upon an ass. "His companion, as he followed him—himself no little wearied—began to say within himself, with a touch of human weakness, 'This man's family was not of equal standing with mine own. And now, look you, he rideth, and I on foot lead his ass.' Even as he thus reasoned, the holy man forthwith dismounted from the ass, saying,

'It is not fitting, Brother, that I should ride, and thou walk afoot, for that in the world thou wert of nobler birth and more standing than I.' Then the Brother was dumb with amazement, and blushed for shame, and, perceiving his fault, fell at the other's feet, which he bedewed with tears, and laid bare what had been his thought, and implored pardon."

Another beautiful Franciscan story reminds us that telepathy often achieves without effort results which the most earnest devotees of "menticulture" are powerless to produce, and that there are many people in the world to-day united by such close bonds of love and sympathy that the one instinctively feels and obeys some mysterious summons of the soul when the other needs him. We are told in the Fioretti that St. Francis being assured of his approaching death, longed for the presence and the ministrations of the Lady Jacoba di Settesoli. As he was dictating a letter to one of the Brethren, asking her to come immediately, and to bring with her "the things she was wont to give him when he was sick, and the things that would be needed for his burial," he became aware that she had already arrived, and, stopping the astonished amanuensis, sent the porter to admit her. The yearning of the Saint in Assisi for her presence had reached her while praying in Rome one night, and, irresistibly drawn by the sheer force of his love and longing, she appeared at his bedside, bringing with her all that he had desired.

Telepathy, then, is a mysterious and potent force which will not allow itself to be bound with any of the strictures which we have seen that the claims of the spiritual life may exact from other manifestations of the psychic. Rather it is possible to regard it in its highest manifestations as a part of that intuition by which alone, as Bergson tells us, we may grasp Reality: as the clue to the secret which the mystics have discovered—the secret of rapturous and inviolate union between the human and the divine.

In accordance with our original project we have attempted, however, inadequately in the space at our disposal, some adjustment of the respective claims of psychic and spiritual forces. We have found that the former only become a danger to the latter when they are brought into undue prominence, and made an object in themselves, instead of a means to something higher yet. The whole distinction between the two has been so admirably summed up by Miss Underhill in "Mysticism" that I venture to conclude with her words. It will be noted that her distinction is between magic and mysticism; but, having regard to the fact that she defines magic as "all forms of self-seeking transcendentalism," and mysticism as the search after and union with Reality, it can hardly be urged that her analysis falls wide of the mark we have set ourselves in these papers.

"The fundamental difference between the two is," she says, "that magic wants to get, mysticism wants to give." "Magic stands for that form of transcendentalism which does abnormal things, but does not lead anywhere; and we are likely to fall victims to some kind of magic the moment that the declaration 'I want to know' ousts the declaration 'I want to be' from the chief place in our consciousness. At bottom, every student of occultism is striving towards a point at which he may be able to 'touch the button' and rely on the transcendental world springing to do the rest. In this hard-earned acquirement of power over the Many, he tends to forget the One."

"It matters little...whether the end proposed be the evocation of an angel, the power of transcending circumstance, or the healing of disease. The object of the thing is always the same; the deliberate exaltation of the will, till it transcends its usual limitations and obtains for the self or group of selves something which it or they did not previously possess. It is an individualistic and acquisitive science; in all its forms an activity of the intellect, seeking Reality for its own purposes, or for those of humanity at large."

But it is impossible to "extract finality from a method which does not really seek after ultimate things. This method may, and does, teach men goodness, gives them happiness and health. It can even induce in them a certain exaltation in which they become aware, at any rate for a moment, of the existence of a transcendental world—a stupendous achievement. But it will never of itself make them citizens of that world: give to them the freedom of Reality."

RELIGION AND THE SUPERNORMAL.

SIR,—Miss Crafer's article in your issue of the 16th instant appears to me to have been written with but a slight personal knowledge of the Spiritualist movement. Her assumptions are not fair, or based on fact even, for whoever heard of "anyone striving to harness these mighty mysterious powers to serve our petty utilitarian ends as we harness the forces of steam or electricity," and, again, "a dragging back into the soiled and dusty sphere of the material of that which should for ever have superseded it"? The effect of the Spiritualist movement has no place in Miss Crafer's article. Thirty years ago there was a powerful National Secular Society with three weekly papers supported by their movement, now I think only one paper remains, and their halls in London are gone. Mrs. Besant, formerly a vice-president of the N.S.S., has for more than 20 years been labouring in a spiritual field that was, I believe, in the first instance, opened to her mind by an inquiry into the claims of the Spiritualists. During the period is there any religious denomination that has not felt the effect of the Spiritualist propaganda, members being no longer satisfied with the dogmas and creeds, but seeking truth and a broader view of things spiritual? Admitting the phenomena, is it not a field for inquiry by all truth seekers? All the evidence must be personal in order to say "I know," and there are many thousands that do know. The quotation in inverted commas, "their implicit neglect of love," is absolutely at variance with the teaching, for harmony and love and charity are the fundamental basis of their teaching.

I would, against Miss Crafer's view, give that of a speaker who in London a few weeks back concluded his lecture with the following:—"Spiritualism approached in a proper frame of mind, and considered as a religion of a high order, must become the greatest blessing of those who pursue it. It prepares us for the day when we must quit our physical body and proceed to higher rungs of the ladder of evolution. We need not pay the slightest attention to the mockers and scoffers. The followers of all religions in the past have had to bear the 'whips and scorns of time,' and it rather shows the strength of our faith and its solid foundation that we stand together and face the ridicule that the world always showers on those whose ideas it cannot share, and of whose truths it has had no experience."—Yours, &c.,

HELP FOR THE BLIND.

SIR,—It would be idle to imagine that the magnificent scheme of Mr. C. A. Pearson for cheapening the price and increasing the supply of embossed literature for the blind meets with the entire approval of the experts and the authorities who have devoted their earnest labours to the solution of the best means of providing for the welfare of this afflicted class. In the majority of cases, this project has failed to gain the warmest support and the most grateful recognition of the blind themselves. It is felt that, if a hundred thousand pounds can be raised for this disabled section of the community, then this large sum might be expended in other ways much more to their advantage. One who was formerly a superintendent of a very large industrial institution for the training of the blind holds that the only ultimate benefit from this scheme will be found in the awakening and the stimulation of a greater common sympathy in the great cause of the welfare of the blind. He says that if he were at any time to have called together the fifty men employed at his institution and to have announced to them that henceforth any book in Braille could be purchased for a penny, this announcement would have been received by his blind workers without the slightest enthusiasm. Another, who had also been the superintendent of a similar institution, stating that the blind are very rarely fond of reading, doubts the statistics provided by Mr. Pearson as to those who are totally and those who are only partially blind, calls the whole affair a crazy scheme, and says that the only people who will benefit will be those eloquent orators who are to be engaged in stumping the country in favour of the project. Work will be found for unemployed curates and ministers and briefless barristers. On the other hand, whilst there may be such a thing as a Papal and a Spiritual Infallibility, in common human and material affairs, the history of the expert mind reveals the fact that, like all transitory powers, it may make mistakes. When, now nearly fifty years ago, the experts rushed to Kimberley, they failed to find the richest diamond mines in the world. It may be that the experts in the present position are not able to perceive the hidden treasures of the help forthcoming ultimately for the blind from this heroic project nobly undertaken by Mr. C. A. Pearson, who has a genius for organisation, and appears to be one of those powerful personalities who can command success.—Yours, &c.,

THE RIGHT USE OF WORDS.

SIR,—One ought not, I suppose, to judge from the fragment of an address as reported, with only a sentence or two quoted verbatim, but I confess that your Liverpool correspondent's report of the Rev. Donald Fraser's contribution to the discussion on "God in Modern Thought," at the Liberal Christian League meeting, awakened in me a strong desire for protest. I wonder whether it is he, or only your correspondent, describing his position, who uses the expression, "God is the sum of all values plus x." But Mr. Fraser is quoted as declaring, "I am God, I share in one Identity. 'Being' is absolute. Persons are but forms of expression"—which recalls Mr. Campbell's "Jesus was God, but so are we," in the New Theology book. It is a mode of expression which, from the point of view of religion, has always seemed to me mischievous and untrue.

Whether we, as living beings, who think and feel for ourselves, with individual, personal experience, are merely "forms of expression" or not, whatever that may mean, we are here now, aware that our life, with all the mystery of it, is not of ourselves alone. And if we know anything, we know that we are not the Absolute Being, the One who is in all and over all. This One is the God in whom we trust, as the Source of our being, in whose eternal life our individual lives find their meaning and their confidence. We look up to God, aware of the claims of righteousness and truth, as his eternal purpose of good, our Father's will, which we are learning to understand and to do. We know the joy and the strength of surrender to those high claims. It is the strength of the Eternal that quickens us in our obedience. We give ourselves to God, and with the knowledge of his will there comes to us a growing trust in the Eternal Goodness and the vision of the Love that wakens in us the immortal hope and joy unutterable. Through the darkness and the light, "in his will is our peace."

God is the deepest reality of our life, for we rest in him. How can a man who feels that, and in simplicity of heart prays to God, makes confession and asks forgiveness, and knows the great peace of the dawning thought of the perfect love of God—how is it possible for him to say, "I am God"? It appears to me that he ought to find some other word for that of which he speaks. Let me add the suggestion of a very helpful thought from the article on "Divine Immanence" by Professor Henry Jones, in the Hibbert Journal of July, 1907. "I am tempted to believe," he says, "that there is a higher for man and a greater for God than absorption . . . His love is not less, nor His light nor His power, if they are reflected back upon Him from spirits that in devoting themselves, regain themselves, and in giving themselves to His service have, without end, ever greater selves to give."—Yours, &c.,

AN EXPERIMENT IN CHURCH MEMBERSHIP.

SIR,—The question of church membership is a difficult one, and one which is exercising the minds of thoughtful people in more than one denomination. The great sacerdotal churches, in which membership has chiefly to do with the reception of sacraments, and involves no power of church government, are not much concerned by it. But with such communities as the Free Churches it is very different, especially with those churches which are congregational in government.

Where the congregation governs it is very desirable to know what constitutes such membership as will confer voting power, and this is a matter about which there is considerable diversity and confusion.

In our own churches the vote is usually confined to those who pay a pew rent, or a subscription, though I believe there are some churches in which all power is really confined to the trustees. The pew rent has been very generally abandoned, and a subscription which gives the right to a pew or sitting adopted in place of it. It has not the fixity of a pew rent, nor quite the same security, but it comes to very much the same thing. Voting power is confined to the subscribers, as formerly to the pew renters. Now this limitation of voting power to those who pay a subscription or a pew rent has been objected to for the reason that it disfranchises the poor, who are not able to do more than contribute to the collections, though they may be regular attendants; and the young or dependent, who use the pews paid for by the head of the family.

Efforts to enlarge the franchise by giving membership with voting power for a nominal registration fee of a shilling have been made, and not with satisfactory results. The danger of such a proceeding is that it creates a class of small subscribers who pay the registration fee for the sake of getting the vote, and use it to outvote the real supporters of the church. This is no mere imaginary peril, and any fixed small payment is open to the objection. But there is another direction in which the franchise might be enlarged without the hazard of such an abuse—the direction of service.

The personnel of churches may be roughly divided into the workers and those who do not work. Some of the workers are subscribers, but by no means all of them. In most churches there are those who have worked for years in the Sunday school, in the choir, and other departments, but who have never been recognised as members and allowed voting power, because they are not subscribers. They are not subscribers chiefly owing to the fact that they are not heads of households. Some of them are occupied with home duties to which no salary is attached. Some, it may be, are serving an apprenticeship or studying for a profession. They give their service, their zeal, their devotion, but they are unable to subscribe. Would it not be well to recognise such service by giving them the privileges and responsibilities of church membership? The writer having brought this matter before his church committee, it was unanimously recommended that five young people, all tried and efficient workers, should be received into full church membership, and at its annual meeting the church unanimously agreed to the proposal, and cards of membership were given to each of them. I have called this an experiment in church membership, and I believe it is, as yet, an untried one in our group of churches, though a short time ago a Congregational Church, I believe for the first time, accorded church recognition to its Sunday school teachers as such. It is with the hope that other churches may be moved to try the experiment, and so gain the strength which may be derived from the interest and co-operation of the young, that I have been induced to narrate it.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE LARGER LIFE.

The Larger Life: a Way through Experience towards the Truth. By John Dendy. London: The Sunday School Association, 1914.

THIS is a really helpful book, dealing, in a spirit of broad, generous, thoughtful optimism, with the great questions which are involved in the foundations of Religion and Morality. The author expresses his indebtedness to the Gifford Lectures of Mr. R. B. (now Lord) Haldane, and Professor James Ward, and to the Psychology of the late William James. These references indicate a general point of view; and it is scarcely necessary to add that the book is totally free from academic pedantry in thought or expression. Part of its attractiveness consists in the fact that it is like the "thinking aloud" of a man of mature and wide experience of life. The scope of the author's inquiries may be indicated by reference to the titles of his central chapters: "Mind and Body," "The Creative Power of Mind," "The Freedom of the Mind," "Minds and Things," "The Thought of God," "Nature and God," "Nature and Man," "God and Man," "Man and Men." One of the primary convictions underlying his whole treatment is expressed in the following quotation:—

"We are like dwellers in the interior of an island, born with the sound of the distant sea faintly in our ears. At first we do not recognise this sound for what it is, though its mystery attracts us and pervades our life. As we push our way outwards in any direction, along paths often difficult and tedious, the sound grows in volume and distinctness, until at last from some hilltop we see the mighty and mysterious ocean from which it comes. So it is that, given an open mind and loving heart, the paths of human experience are all leading us outward from the little centre of self into the ocean of being by which we are surrounded, and which we are learning to recognise more and more as a manifestation of God—not to be lost there but to share in a greatness which is our destiny. Let us then go on our way in a reasonable confidence—confidence in ourselves and our destiny—confidence in the Supreme Being from whom we sprang, towards whom we move. In great Literature, in Science, in Art, in the lessons of History on the great scale, and of individual experience on the small scale, in whatever line of experience we choose to follow, God is being made more and more manifest to us, wherever the Best comes to light and takes its proper place."

The author expresses the modest hope that the book "may be of use in directing the attention of younger people, who have not become set in their habits of thought, to a way of looking at life and the world in which they find themselves, which the ordinary school education does not give." We believe that ministers and teachers will find the book useful and helpful in suggesting the best ways of bringing these great subjects before senior and adult classes, and that such a treatment of such subjects, by a thoughtful layman, will be useful even to the minister in his pulpit work.

PROFESSOR EUCKEN'S ESSAYS.

Collected Essays of Rudolf Eucken. Edited and translated by Meyrick Booth, B.Sc., Ph.D. (Jena). London: T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

A LONG time ago the students of a certain theological college used, during the summer vacations, to take their turn in conducting the services for a series of Sundays at a chapel in a little country town. The last regular minister had retired, owing to old age, but he continued to reside in the town, and was an honoured member of the congregation; and it was his pleasant custom to invite the student who was officiating for the time being to have a walk with him on a week-day afternoon. During those walks the conversation always turned on philosophy, in which the old gentleman was interested, and in which he assumed that every student was an expert; and to each one he invariably put the question: "Would you, Mr. So-and-so, tell me, in a few words, what is the essence of the Hegelian philosophy?" If he were alive now, and the present students of the college were to walk with him, it is possible that he would ask them, not about Hegel's philosophy, but about Eucken's. Anyhow, it is in the latter that the religious mind of to-day is specially interested. Eucken has set forth his philosophy in many treatises, some of which are lengthy and not always easy to understand; and welcome, therefore, to many readers are the clear and concise expositions of his teaching which able disciples have given. But even those who are babes in philosophy will find his "Collected Essays" well within their comprehension. Several of the essays illustrate particularly the religious aspects of his teaching, such as those entitled "Religion and Civilisation," "Philosophy and the Religious Movement," and "The Modern Man and Religion." Indeed, the religious element predominates throughout; and naturally, for Eucken is even more a prophet than an abstract thinker; his, as he claims, is a philosophy of life or action, it is not merely a system of speculation. Among the essays of more general interest is the very brilliant one in which he answers the question: "Are the Germans still Thinkers?" It helps to explain the widespread popularity which he enjoys among his own countrymen. Never surely have their national characteristics, as revealed in history, been more finely suggested. The lecture on "Goethe in his Relation to Philosophy" is another admirable piece of work. Those who can appreciate the "Collected Essays" will be fain to believe that whenever Eucken becomes unintelligible to them he has but ascended a higher height than they yet have reached, and has visions of truth and reality that are still hidden from them. He occupies so distinctive a point of view that the great problems of the world and life have acquired through him a new setting; and the notable feature of this volume is that several of these problems receive in it illuminating treatment. Eucken is ever a fighter. He is out against principalities and powers in the shape of naturalism, intellectualism, pessimism, and anything else that seems to him to deny or destroy the spiritual nature of man. What he says in concluding the essay "In Memory of Kant" is very true of himself: "He will lend us invaluable assistance in our endeavour to win a meaning and a spiritual content for human existence."

IN SHAKESPEARE LAND.

Highways and Byways in Shakespeare's Country. By W. H. Hutton, with Illustrations by Edmund H. New. London: Macmillan & Co. 5s. net.

As a pleasant task, with a light and happy heart, Archdeacon Hutton tells us in his preface, he undertook to write this book, having known and loved the Shakespeare country for nearly forty years; and with his added skill as a historian he proves a very pleasant guide through the country. He makes us sharers in his keen appreciation of its great memories and its natural beauties, as the heart of England, nor does he disdain at times to beguile the way with amusing gossip. He is happy also in his artist companion. We have long been familiar with Mr. Edmund New's drawings of the Shakespeare house and Stratford Church, Anne Hathaway's Cottage and Warwick Castle, the Evesham bell-tower and Coventry spires, Charlecote and Compton-Wynyates, as they were published in Methuen's "Little Guide" to Shakespeare's country fifteen years ago, and there is another little book on Evesham, which Mr. New both wrote and illustrated in the series of "Temple Topographies." It is a well-deserved tribute to his gifts as a native artist of the district that he should have been chosen to illustrate this new book also. Some of the pictures are inevitably almost exactly repeated or with very slight alteration in the point of view, but the larger page gives more scope for the drawing, and so we have a complete view of Compton Wynyates, one of the most beautiful of Tudor houses, as frontispiece, and there are a great many more pictures throughout the book.

Author and artist are at one in their admiration for the noble castles and great houses of the district, but no less in their delight over the charm of the villages and little country towns, such as Chipping Campden. "Perhaps the loveliest thing of its kind in England," Archdeacon Hutton says of Campden High-street, and he writes eloquently of the history associated with Warwick Castle and Kenilworth. But Shakespeare himself is, of course, the central interest. There is due appreciation of what Benson has done for Stratford through his devotion to the great dramatist, and we gladly recognise in this book as a whole another tribute not unworthily offered by the author "to the memory of the poet who has been his greatest friend for nearly fifty years, in the hope that 'never anything can be amiss, when simpleness and duty tender it.'"

THE MAGIC RING OF BLACK HOLLOW.

It was, indeed, a black hollow, a great big, deep hole in the hills, full of dark trees and gloom. The people who lived in it were gloomy, too; the darkness all round seemed to make a darkness on their faces and in their lives. The stranger who came travelling through the hollow with the magic ring on his finger thought he had never seen so gloomy and sad a set of folks. "Dear me," thought he, as a dull, vacant stare met him from every hut he passed, "where shall I find a bright, happy home in which to spend the night?" Luckily his eye lit on a small hut perched on a ledge above the forest; the sun was shining brightly on its window, and this caught his eye. "The man who lives there," he thought, "ought to be a cheerful fellow; he is above the gloom of the forest, and the sun makes all the difference; it is worth the climb." So up he scrambled through the tree trunks and roots and stones to the ledge, and knocked at the door. A stalwart woodcutter opened it; one glance at his face was enough. The stranger asked if he might spend the night there, it was too far across the hills to the next town, and the sun would soon set.

"Certainly, certainly," said the woodcutter, and took him in.

"You are a sad-faced folk here," said the stranger next day, as he was departing, "have you all lost heart?"

"Most of us," was the reply, "the hollow is dark, you see, with the trees, and the sun cannot get through."

"But there is sunshine on this ledge," said the stranger.

"Oh, yes," said the woodcutter; "but then, they won't climb."

"Well," said the stranger, drawing off his ring, "let us see if we can mend matters. I cannot pay you for your kindness except in this way. I am journeying over the hills, but I shall be back this way in three months. If you care to do as I say with this ring, I think you may bring great happiness to the hollow."

The woodcutter examined the ring; it had a beautiful stone in it, and being bright and polished, shone like a star. His eyes lit up as he looked at it.

"Yes, it is bright," said the stranger, "and if you will leave it outside on your window-sill so that it can catch the sun it will give light to the whole hollow. No one can steal it, it is a magic ring. All you must do is to remember my order:

Wet or fine,
Let it shine."

"But the dust and the rain," began the woodcutter.

"They won't matter," was the reply. "You must rub the ring from time to time to keep it bright"—and he was gone.

The woodcutter put the ring on his window-sill, and as the sun shone on it, it sparkled so that the light shone right down into the hollow. The gloomy people came out of their huts to stare at it; one or two thought it must be a new star. At last one who was more curious than the rest crept up the pathway to the ledge, and examined it as it lay in the sun.

"That is a very bright ring you have," he said to the woodcutter.

The woodcutter whistled and laughed. "Ah, ah," he said, "it is a magic ring, that ring; it makes the whole house full of light."

"It is much brighter than mine," said the newcomer enviously. He had a dull gold ring on one finger, and he held it close to the magic ring to compare it. "Look," he said, "how dull my ring looks."

"It could do with a polish now and again, I expect," said the woodcutter. "This one is bright enough, it is true, but I have to polish it just the same when the dust and rain are upon it."

The newcomer looked at his ring sadly. "No, polish won't do," he said, "mine is too old, I suppose."

Without thinking he put his ring close to the magic ring once again, and this time his hand shook and the rings touched. As they did so, his own dull ring leaped into brightness; it shone almost as brightly as the magic ring.

"I say," he said, in a new keen tone of voice, "look at this; what a change."

The woodcutter looked and was surprised. "That is the magic, no doubt," he said after a pause. "Rub your ring up when you get home, and it will look as good as new."

The man was gone like a shot, and so wonderfully did his ring shine that his neighbours wondered at the brightness which had suddenly come into his home. He showed them the ring, and told them of his visit to the ledge, and all day long, and for weeks after, the men and women of the Black Hollow crept up the path to the woodcutter's hut, and made their own old dull rings bright again with a touch of the magic ring. And so the Black Hollow seemed to change from darkness to light. Every hut was now full of laughter and love; wherever a ring shone the home seemed full of light.

But the woodcutter grew envious. As the people's rings became bright, his own magic ring seemed to lose some of its brightness. Everybody else's ring was now as bright as his own; one or two of them even seemed to have magic properties caught from his. He grew jealous and angry. At last he determined to put his ring away; nobody should see it any more, nobody else's ring should regain its brightness at the expense of his own ring's beauty. So he locked it up in a drawer, and became gloomy and sad. He was the most miserable man in the hollow by the time the stranger returned. The stranger noticed it at once.

"Where is my ring?" he said, sharply, for he could see that it was not on the window-sill.

"Your ring?" repeated the woodcutter, surprised; he had forgotten that the ring was not his own.

"Yes, my ring," said the stranger. "I bade you keep it safely till I returned, and, above all things, you were to put it in the sunshine, and wet or fine let it shine."

The woodcutter unlocked the drawer and took it out; it was dull and dusty.

"Excuse me," he said, and began to polish it with a cloth; but it was still as dull as ever.

"That is because it is not in the sun," said the stranger.

"No," replied the woodcutter, "it is because all the rings in the hollow have been made bright by touching this one. The magic power has all gone out of it."

The stranger picked up the ring, and set it on the window-sill in the sun; it shone as brightly as ever.

"Nothing is bright when the heart of the owner is not bright," he said, shortly; "the magic is not in the ring alone, it is only present when the sun shines on the ring. You had forgotten that this ring was mine, and so you had allowed a cloud of envy to cover your heart because you thought the rings in the Hollow were brighter than your own. The cloud kept the sunshine from the ring, and it could not shine. A magic ring is like a heart, a gift from God; let it live in the sunshine every day, and all hearts around it take fire and shine, too; let it hide behind a cloud, and all the magic is gone."

"I am sorry," said the woodcutter, humbly, "I ought to have known."

"You know now," was the reply. "I shall leave you the ring for your own, and bid you good-bye."

He turned and was gone.

The woodcutter looked after him in the sunshine that streamed down through the trees. "And it's good-bye to Black Hollow, too," he said with a smile. "We must call it the Valley of the Magic Ring now, thanks to him."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

MRS. BESANT AT QUEEN'S HALL. THE GOD-IDEA.

MRS. BESANT delivered the second of the series of lectures on "Mysticism" at the Queen's Hall on Sunday evening, her subject being "The God-Idea." By that title, she said, she wished to indicate the many ideas of God which have been held during the evolution of mankind. In all the religions of the world there was to be found a lofty conception of God which became the mystical idea when men sought to know God directly. At times it was confused with more ignorant notions, for the minds of men are various, and each man's idea of God can only be that which he is himself able to fabricate, and which satisfies the yearning of his own heart; but there was a universal testimony to this great conception embodied in the thought of the noblest and most spiritual of mankind, and left on record for the inspiration of the world from the earliest dawn of history down to the present day. The researches on which the science of comparative mythology was established in the last century gave to the West the startling knowledge that all the great religions, living or dead, taught many of the same ideas, proclaimed many of the same doctrines, and bore testimony to the same universal truths. By the labours of the antiquarian, the archæologist, and the student of philology and ancient civilisations, there was gradually unrolled before the minds of the educated and thoughtful a mass of information stretching back for thousands upon thousands of years, all bearing testimony to religious truths which in their main outline were identical. As a result of this men began to speculate as to the reason for the countless likenesses emerging from these discoveries, and not unnaturally they imagined that as in the past humanity must have been much less evolved than it is to-day, the child-nations of antiquity could not have formulated for themselves the conceptions that are to be found in the literature of some of the most ancient peoples; they concluded, therefore, that before the ancient and philosophical religions which they were studying were founded, there must have been a long period of unrecorded history in which, out of the ignorance of the savage and barbarian, personifying the powers of nature, and trying to propitiate them in his helplessness and terror, there gradually grew up the primary ideas of God. Thus the science of comparative mythology was built up on a basis of irrefutable facts, but bound together by an assumption that was not proved—that the idea of God was but an evolution from the past, and that we must regard the childish ideal of the ignorant savage as the origin of all the loftier thoughts of God that came afterwards.

But a little later on another startling fact emerged as the result of more careful research, namely, that in the background of every savage faith, kept as a sacred thing to be spoken of only with reverence and awe, behind all the superficial beliefs in gods and devils and sacrifices to propitiate hostile powers in the universe, there was one Being ever believed in whose symbol was the over-arching sky, who had no image nor likeness, to whom no prayers went up and no sacrifices were offered; a mighty, all-embracing Life sometimes spoken of as the Great Spirit, sometimes by no special name at all but only indicated by symbols. It was asked, whence could this idea have arisen? How could it have come into these undeveloped minds? How could a conception so great have birth in the brain of a savage? And about this time another view was put forward to account for the identities found in all religions, the view, namely, that they all had the same origin, and were given to the world by a line of great teachers, highly evolved spiritual men who came from time to time to show forth the same ideas in language and form suited to the period. It was suggested that the child-nations were taught by those who knew, who by their own evolution had reached the point where the loftier vision of the Supreme was seen, and that these ideas were always given to the world as the basis of a new religion and were not an evolution out of the past. Those who put forward this view claimed the evidence of the scriptures of the oldest civilisations as well as the more modern, and pointed to books that went back into the night of time, the Vedas of the Hindus, the sacred books of the Zoroastrians and Egyptians and of the races bordering the Mediterranean. The lofty conceptions found therein tended, it was true, to lose their spirituality and to become more rationalistic as the ages went by, but where they still existed amongst savage people they must, from this standpoint, be regarded as the remnant of an exalted faith in degenerate races that were dying out; as the echo of teachings which they had received in days when they were strong, and intelligent, and willing to be taught; as landmarks of a God-idea mightier than they could now conceive of, and which practically has no influence any longer on their religion or their lives.

Mrs. Besant then proceeded to outline the two great types of religion known as Solar Worship and Nature Worship, traces of which still strongly survive in the religious faiths of to-day. The more ignorant peoples were taught by symbols largely drawn from the natural objects around them, which were but the veil of divinity, the mightiest of these symbols being the sun, the source of light and heat and life. In ancient Peru the Incas were called the Children of the Sun, and in their joyous worship the sun was always the symbol of the all-nourishing and all-radiating life of God. In Hinduism, which has given us some of the most sublime conceptions of the God-idea that have ever been recorded, the sun is still regarded as the physical symbol of God by millions as they bathe on the banks of the rivers at its rising with words of solemn invocation on their lips. Not only is this symbolism to be found all through the history of religion, but whenever the human element comes into the God-idea, as it does in every great religion, it is found that the story of God made man follows the course of the sun throughout the solar year.

The next great stage of the God-ideas was found, said Mrs. Besant, in the religions which are to be described as national, God being a tribal rather than a universal deity. The oldest of these was, of course, Hinduism, which was a social organisation as well as a pantheistic religion. Here a distinction was drawn by the lecturer between philosophical pantheism, which postulates one existence whereof all things are modes, God being co-terminous with but not outside whatever worlds or universes exist, and entirely impersonal and inaccessible to any appeal; and religious pantheism, a very different thing, in which all forms of life are regarded as an expression of a Consciousness beyond and above all forms, the Supreme Self, Brahman, who, in his infinite being, is transcendent as well as immanent. And here the inquirer always came in contact with what the West has called polytheism, founding their conception of the facts underlying it upon the Greek and Roman faiths, and quite failing to comprehend what the Hindu understands by those facts in consequence of the different meaning attached to the word "god" or "gods." A "god" is in the East what would be known among Christians as an angel, or archangel, and the devas are simply "shining ones," like those in Bunyan's vision. A woman is called the "goddess of prosperity," the "light and goddess of the home," and some idea of the real meaning underlying polytheism is indicated in the following saying from one of the Upanishads in which a great Hindu philosopher explains to his wife what is the Self, the one Life of the universe, of which everything is the reflection. "Not for the sake of the husband is the husband dear," he says, "but for the sake of the Self is the husband dear. Not for the sake of the wife is the wife dear, but for the sake of the Self is the wife dear. Not for the sake of the son is the son dear, but for the sake of the Self the son is dear. Not for the sake of the gods are the gods dear, but for the sake of the Self are the gods dear." Polytheism, therefore, does not mean that there are a number of Gods, but that in a world in which everything embodies the life of God, there is nothing existing that does not share in His glory and in His strength, and that He may be worshipped under many forms, even the form that evokes the love of the most degraded and is to him beautiful and worthy of homage.

After dealing with the ancient Hebrew faith, another form of national religion, which changed its earlier and more limited idea of God to the more splendid conceptions which it brought back to Judæa after the captivity and its contact with the ancient civilisations of Assyria and Babylonia, Mrs. Besant passed to the three more modern universal religions, Buddhism, Islam, and Christianity. In Islam, she said, God was regarded more as a monarch and ruler, in Northern Buddhism as the supreme and boundless Buddha (in Southern Buddhism there cannot be said to be any idea of God); while in Christianity we have a new and great contribution in the central idea of God as the Father of Spirits, the Father of all mankind. Among many quotations which were given from the great scriptures of the world embodying the God-idea, the following may be selected as typical:—"When darkness was not, when there was neither day nor night, nor being nor not-being, then was there the All-Blessed, ever alone. None is able to comprehend Him in the space above, in the space below, in the space between. For Him whose name is infinite glory there is no likeness. Not in the sight abides His form; none beholds Him with the eye. Those who know Him, dwelling in the heart, by love and wisdom, they become immortal." (Upanishads) "God saith, . . . Whoso seeketh to approach Me one span, I seek to approach one cubit; and whoso seeketh to approach Me one cubit, I seek to approach him two fathoms; and whoso walketh towards Me, I run towards him." (Sayings of Muhammed.) . . . "Whatsoever is glorious, good, beautiful and mighty, understand thou that to go forth from a fragment of My splendour. . . Having pervaded this whole universe with one fragment of Myself, I remain." (Bhagavad-gita.) These were the expressions of religious faith at its highest, and it was to the highest that they must turn, not to the lowest believed in by ignorant people, in order to test their idea of God. Only one thing was needed when they had traced this lofty conception through history, and that was to turn it into a mystical reality in the heart. Over and over again God was spoken of in the ancient scriptures as near as well as distant, and it is in the heart alone that the mystic sees Him. "If there is one Life and one Life only," Mrs. Besant said, in conclusion, "then your lives and mine, however poor and weak and childish and undeveloped, have in them the life of God Himself. 'The Kingdom of God is within you,' said the great revealer of God to the Western world. It is in your own hearts, in the depths of your own being that you must seek for Him, and if you cannot find Him there you will never be sure of Him anywhere. But if once you catch a glimpse of the eternal within you, the eternal around you will shine out through everything. Nature is but a veil hiding the smile of God, and think what it must mean to us when she is no longer a soulless mechanism, but a living organism; when God is no longer an abstraction, but a living Spirit, the friend and lover of man. It is the glory and joy of the mystic that wherever he goes he sees God, wherever he looks there is some trace of His being—in the song of the birds, in the beauty of the landscape, in the love of the mother, in the strength of the athlete, in the heart of the lowliest. And where is there room for sorrow, what place for fear and grief, to those who know that God is, and that the Self of all is one?"

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE sixty-fourth annual meeting of the London District Unitarian Society was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, May 27, the President, Mr. A. Savage Cooper, in the chair. Before proceeding to the business of the evening Mr. Cooper referred to the recent death of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, who had so entirely identified himself with the aims and objects of the Society, and the following resolution, seconded by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, was passed, all standing:—"That the subscribers to this Society, in annual meeting assembled, desire gratefully to place on record their sense of the most generous and ever-willing help given to all its endeavours by the late Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., formerly its president, and a zealous supporter from its foundation. Their sincere grief at losing so true a friend is blended with the encouraging assurance that, while he was no less a friend to many other good causes, that of Unitarian progress was especially dear to him; and they trust that his noble example will stimulate other Unitarians to do all they can to carry forward a work so necessary to the good of the community. They beg respectfully to offer their deep sympathy and condolence to Lady Durning-Lawrence in her sad loss."

The secretary, Mr. Ronald Bartram, who stated that letters apologising for unavoidable absence had been received from Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, Mr. H. Harrison, and Mrs. Stannus, presented the annual report, which is a chronicle of quiet and steady work, much of which cannot, of necessity, be recorded in detail or made to yield striking statistics. The Council expresses its sincere sympathy with the relatives of three of their earnest supporters whose death is deeply regretted, namely Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, in whom the society loses one who for fifteen years had been its hon. secretary, and also a vice-president, and Mrs. Henry Rutt, for many years a member of the Committee. The financial statement was presented by the hon. treasurer, Mr. T. B. Taylor, who urged the members to obtain new subscribers and help to place the society on a better business footing.

The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, the missionary minister, then presented his report, which he would ask them to take as read. He made special reference to the splendid opening at Deptford for an institutional church. Excellent work is being done there under Mr. Carlier, and on one Sunday when he (the speaker) preached at Deptford, he had a congregation of nearly one hundred for the evening service. He advised members of the society to go and see for themselves what was going on, not only there, but in other parts of London as well, and he urged the need for more workers in a field which offered many opportunities for usefulness, especially to young people with various tastes and gifts. The work was well worth doing, and the way in which it was carried on showed that the men and women of to-day were just as loyal to their faith as their forefathers had been.

Mr. Savage Cooper, in moving the adoption of the reports, said the report of the Council alluded to the work of the past year in a very modest way, but he thought more encouragement was to be obtained from a record of steady effort than from one full of brilliant achievements. Meteoric displays were not very lasting, and the best work was not done in rushes. Referring to the United Service at the Dutch Church, he said they were all glad that this had become an annual institution.

Mr. John Ward, M.P., said that although at first it would not appear that there was much connection between his usual activities and those of the Society, whose report he had read with much interest, there was one thing characteristic of them and of every other cause he had ever had anything to do with—their poverty. This was the besetting sin of all institutions that were struggling with the new idea, and they were starting out with what was, to most of their fellow-men, an entirely new idea. It was, of course, as old as the hills, but it had largely been lost sight of for so many generations that it was difficult to get anyone except those who were students of religious history and the human race to take kindly to it. Almost everything they had been taught as children had to be forgotten, and it was a very hard process getting rid of rooted ideas, even when they were convinced that they were wrong. Most people took these things for granted, and so far as the working people of the country were concerned, they had not time to study. He did not say that they always spent such leisure as they had in the best way, but their general position made it almost hopeless for them to appreciate modern thought in relation to religion. But those who were thinking about these things knew that the unity of life was gradually being recognised by scientists and students who saw how the higher organism had been evolved from the lower, but it was difficult to convince men that the same idea applied to religion as well as to other subjects. They had an immense fortress to attack, therefore, even the vested interests which had grown up around religion stood in their way, and they were rather in the position of David going out to fight the giant, whom they could not hope to overthrow all at once. It seemed to him, Mr. Ward continued, that there was great vitality in their movement, which would overcome mountains if only the people in the churches would band themselves together in the right spirit. Their poverty was no disadvantage whatever; it was the asset of every movement for the uplifting of humanity. The trouble was when they stagnated because of the poverty of their ideas and the poverty of human sympathy.

Mr. Colyer, secretary of the Lay Preachers' Union, made some reference to a passage in Mr. Pearson's report, dealing with the lay preachers, and asked that they might be given more opportunities of doing the work for which they were fitting themselves, year by year, and which they desired as an outlet for their energies and enthusiasm. The report was then adopted. The Rev. Basil Martin gave some account of the progress of the movement at Finchley since he settled there, and spoke appreciatively of the encouragement he had received from the Unitarians, against whose coldness he had been warned before he came among them. One thing he complained of, however, that his congregation was too respectable, and that there was not enough of the working-class element in it. His sphere of labour had previously been among the artisan class, and he had always felt that there was a very special call to the minister from those who were struggling for their daily bread. He had often felt the greatest encouragement in talking to these people, with whom he was absolutely at one; he missed the contact with them, and deplored that even on Sundays all classes did not mix together in worshipping God. Another complaint he had to make was that they were rather too middle-aged; they wanted more young people, willing to dedicate themselves to the service of God before the burdens of life grew heavy, and they lost their vigour and enthusiasm. The Rev. Douglas Robson described the conditions of work at Peckham, where a few new members have joined as a result of the Van Mission's efforts, the whole membership having increased about 20 per cent. But the neighbourhood is a difficult one, and although hundreds of people listened to their message when it was preached from the Van, they did not come to the church. Mr. H. C. Montague followed with an interesting record of work done at South Norwood, where there is not yet a church, and they were not respectable at all, in Mr. Martin's sense. The movement there began as a branch of the Progressive League, now the Liberal Christian League, and they stood for the liberal religious ideas. They occupied rooms on the ground floor of an ordinary house, and had been struggling on for about seven years, their various institutions, such as the Women's Meeting, which drew together 30 and 40 members a week, being very successful. Thanks were gratefully given to Mr. Pearson, who had so kindly given them assistance.

Mr. Oscar Dowson moved a resolution commending the work of the committee and officers, which was seconded by the Rev. A. H. Biggs, and passed. Dr. Herbert Smith moved a resolution proposing the re-election of the President and Vice-Presidents, among whom Mr. Howard Young has been included, seconded by Mr. Noel, and passed. A resolution re-electing the chairman of committee and the representatives of the churches was moved from the chair, and seconded by Mr. A. G. Tarrant, and this brought the proceedings to a close.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE.

It was announced at the Assembly at Liverpool that Archdeacon Lilley had consented to become President in succession to the Rev. Dr. J. Drummond.

At the closing public meeting, briefly referred to in our report last week, the Lord Mayor (Mr. Herbert R. Rathbone) presided. He expressed his sympathy with the objects of the Liberal Christian League. Emphasising the fact that the movement had no political significance, and had no connection with the Liberal party, he said it was the outcome of the growing conviction amongst the most thoughtful men and women of all denominations that, in the past, too much importance had been attached to the differences of opinion which separated the various branches of the Christian Church. They had not sufficiently recognised that the spirit of Christian unity should unite all denominations. Hitherto attention seemed to have been devoted mainly to the comparatively few points on which they differed, and not to the many essential principles in which they all agreed. The League was also an assertion of the belief that religion should not be deprived of growing thought and knowledge, and that the old theology, although it embodied important truths, was often stated in a way that was misleading and harmful. It asked for freedom in the exercise of theological thought and in the expression of religious belief. That it should still be necessary to insist on this right after so many centuries of experience was strange, and pointed to the harm done to all that was best in religion by the denial of this freedom. But unfortunately there was still a disposition on the part of what, perhaps, was a majority of the people to refuse to recognise in the discussion of religions this freedom of thought and expression, though it was admitted to be essential in the study of any other subject. If the spirit of Christ was made manifest in all the relations of life, it would be seen that, while they might have diversions of thought and expression, they yet all belonged to one Church. And the real test of membership of that Church was the practical manifestation of the spirit of Christ in daily life.

The Rev. A. J. Humphreys (Vicar of St. Paul's, Accrington) spoke on "The Church the Age Needs." He said they were getting beyond mere individualism in the State, and he believed they were getting beyond it in the Church, where it still largely persisted. The difficulty had been to find an organisation which could include all true Christians. The remedy was not to be found in disestablishing and disendowing, but rather by a system of concurrent endowment. The hold that a state Church had was seen in the fact that most unattached persons claimed to belong to the Church of England. The criminals in our jails did; he rejoiced at it, for the Church must not disown anybody, but rather seek to restore and lift up the lost. But they must not expect to secure uniformity; the Act of Uniformity must be abolished, their basis must be a spiritual unity, but the state and religion should never be separated, and the Church should be a national expression of the union of the religious and secular aspects of life.

Mrs. H. D. Roberts said her topic was "The Religious Teacher the Age Needs." With regard to Mr. Humphreys' suggestion the difficulty lay in the number of persons outside all the Churches. To-day the Church does not fill the thoughts of the people, and among the ministers themselves some are not sufficiently sure of their position to be leaders, while those who are positive are by no means convincing. She ventured to think, though we could not foresee the future, that we should not repeat the past, and that the age required a new order of spiritual teachers, consisting of those who could speak from personal experience. She then described in glowing terms the qualities desirable in such a teacher, but anything short of the actual words would not do this portion of the address justice. Sufficient to say it won the very warm applause of the large audience.

Mr. Lawrence D. Holt, who followed, has won the respect of his fellow-citizens by his able and successful efforts to effect a peaceful settlement of the recent difficulties at the docks. The subject, he said, upon which he had been invited to speak was "The State the Age Needs." He had no Utopian theories and did not believe in them, but he pleaded for mutual consideration of employers and employed upon present lines. The danger was that they should squander their resources, which, after all, had their limit. In Liverpool they had done much, but many obstacles were created by the workers themselves. Let them think more—sound action followed on sound thought. The spirit of routine must give place to the spirit of sympathy and comprehension.

The Rev. M. F. Bovenizer followed in a racy speech advocating a free church, in a free State, and equal rights for both sexes.

Mr. E. Capleton, who moved a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor for presiding, spoke of the long and honoured presidency of the name of Rathbone with the civic history of Liverpool. It was also at Liverpool, nearly fifty years ago, that he first learnt the principle of free and undogmatic religion. The Lord Mayor, in replying, said that he did not know much about the League when he entered the room, but it had won his sympathies, and he hoped to do better if they asked him again.

MANSFORD HOUSE, BIRCHINGTON.

DESCRIPTION OF THE NEW BUILDING.

ON May 30 there will be inaugurated the new house which has been designed and built by Mr. Ronald P. Jones at Birchington, on the North Kent Coast, as a gift for the use of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, of which he is the secretary. For a year the convalescent and holiday work of the Mission has been carried out experimentally in an existing house which Mr. Jones rented and furnished for the purpose, and the new "Mansford House" will provide a permanent home for this branch of the Mission's activities.

The site is about 140 ft. square, and lies among country house and bungalow properties with large gardens three minutes' walk from the station, and separated from the edge of the cliff by a belt of trees which protect it from the north and north-east winds prevalent in the winter. As the sea is here on the north side, it was thought desirable that the house should face away from it in order to obtain all the available sunshine, but the open cliff plateau begins close to the site, and the shore can be reached through a break in the cliff face only 200 yards away.

The building is designed so that one part of it can be in use all the year round for convalescent or occasional holiday purposes, and this is planned as an ordinary house with dining-room, sitting-room, &c., and bedrooms for three or four visitors in addition to the staff. For the summer holiday season, extending over a period of about ten weeks, a wing is added on the east side, and contains, on the ground floor, a large recreation room 36 ft. by 18 ft., opening on to a covered verandah along its whole length, 10 ft. wide, enclosed at the ends, but open on the south side. Above this room are two dormitories, opening on to a balcony over the verandah, and, in addition to the ordinary bathroom a special washing room is provided in connection with the dormitories. This summer wing will accommodate 12 visitors, and the kitchen department is so arranged that meals can be served with equal convenience either in the dining room during the winter, or in the recreation room or verandah during the summer. The interior woodwork is stained green throughout, and downstairs the floors are of wood-block, stained and waxed, so that no linoleum is required, and the recreation room can easily be cleared for games, &c.

In the treatment of the exterior, it was the donor's wish to depart as far as possible from the architectural style which is usually associated with "holiday homes" and similar institutions. The ground floor is faced with buff roughcast above a plinth of plum-coloured brick; the wood columns and balustrade of the verandah and the rest of the woodwork being painted white. The first-floor walls and the roofs are covered with blue-green Westmoreland slates, specially chosen for their thickness and beauty of texture; above one of the bedrooms the cistern room is enlarged to form a kind of "look-out" room covered with a cupola topped by a wrought-iron weathervane. The general effect aimed at is that of the long and low slate-hung houses which give such charm to the Cornish fishing villages (but which require the brilliant Cornish atmosphere to give the right colour effect to their grey slates).

The site encloses enough ground for flower-beds, kitchen garden, and a large lawn for outdoor games, and the furniture and other equipment had already been provided for the temporary house. While the building is intended primarily for the use of those connected with Mansford-street, accommodation will probably be available from time to time—except during the summer holiday season—for visitors from our other missions or churches in and around London, and the secretary of the Managing Committee, the Rev. G. Cooper, will be glad to send particulars of the conditions and scale of charges to any who are interested in the scheme. The ordinary "Country Holiday and Excursion Fund" of the Mission is being enlarged to provide for the maintenance of Mansford House, and the treasurer, Mrs. S. H. Punnett, of 10, Chesterford-gardens, Hampstead, will welcome new or increased subscriptions which may be sent to her for that purpose.

THE RELIGIOUS SITUATION IN FRANCE.

ADDRESS BY M. VIENOT.

A FEW weeks ago M. John Vienot, the editor of the Revue Chretienne, gave the last lecture of the session to the members of the Protestantisch-liberalen Verein, at Strassburg. He spoke on the religious situation in France. His remarks were based on the statement that at the present time a great struggle is being carried on in France between Authority and Liberty, between the middle ages and the modern world which desires to organise itself on its own lines. This struggle may be traced back as far as the 16th century, when Scholasticism, which imprisoned all divine and human verities in formulæ, was met in opposition by conscience, enlightened by the Gospel. The deliverance of the spirit, in France as well as elsewhere, goes back to Luther, and not to Erasmus and Lefevre d'Etayles, as many patriotically minded historians think. It is significant that already in 1523 an Austin friar was burned at the stake in Paris for heresy, and with him Luther's writings. And how deeply Protestant views had become rooted within a short period is shown by the fact that in 1560 there were in France no less than 300 churches in which no mass had been said during 30 years. The best of the French people—its cultured and literary leaders—were Protestants. The repeal of the Edict of Nantes made possible that exaggerated increase of the power of kings which cost Louis XVI. his life. Although the Revolution accomplished great things, it did not solve the religious problem. The voices which were heard in the Directoire in favour of a liberal religion died away unheeded.

At the present time, M. Vienot continued, Catholicism had been strengthened inwardly by the separation of Church and State. The 400,000,000 francs lost by the Catholic Church in outward possessions are more than made up by greater power. New churches have been founded, and the religious life was based more than ever on mediæval conceptions. In the seminaries the writings of Thomas Aquinas were chiefly taught. Amongst the people emphasis was laid on the legend of the Apostles themselves having been the missionaries of France. The manner in which the Centenary of Veuillot, the ultra-catholic, was celebrated showed plainly the new power of the church.

Radical liberal thought, in M. Vienot's opinion, does not endanger the religious life. In spite of the admirable work of critics, some of whom are men of distinction, humanity would not rest contented with negations only. It was significant that the well-known editor of a widely circulated periodical lately wrote "Atheism is dying"; and that the editor of the socialistic Humanite confessed that the sources of spiritual life are not choked by Socialism, and that religion is especially needed in a society which does not believe in authority. These seekers after truth would not return to Catholicism. To them Christianity held out its hands, that Christianity to which the 16th century gave its distinctive features, and which was based on the Gospel of Jesus. It was accordingly imperative that the efforts of Protestants should be directed towards making known in France the Protestant Confession with all its moral strength and its social demands.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE annual meeting of the National Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union will be held at Essex Hall, on Tuesday, June 2, at 5.30 p.m., the president, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., in the chair.

THE usual Whit-week Ministers' Meeting will be held at Essex Hall on Thursday afternoon, June 4, at half-past three o'clock, when the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., of Boston, U.S.A., will speak on "The Church of To-day and of To-morrow," to be followed by discussion. The Rev. Henry Gow will preside.

THE 21st annual meeting of the National Unitarian Temperance Association will be held at Essex Hall on Friday, June 5, at 7.30, the president, the Rev. W. G. Tarant, in the chair. The speakers will include Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mrs. Shaen Solly, and Dr. Crooker and Miss Harriet M. Johnson, who will both give some account of the progress of the Temperance Movement in America. A resolution urging the Government to bring in a thorough measure of Temperance reform without further delay will also be moved. In the afternoon there will be a short discussion on "Compulsory Temperance Teaching in Schools."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bolton.—The annual school sermons in connection with Halliwell-road Free Church, were held on Sunday, May 24. Councillor Isaac Barrow, of Westhoughton, took the scholars' service in the morning, and the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield, preached in the afternoon and evening to large congregations. The collections amounted to over £30.

British Women's League.—Any member of the British League of Unitarian Women who intends spending the summer holiday in Norway this year is requested to communicate with Miss H. Brooke Herford at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, with a view to delivering a message by hand to Unitarian friends in Christiania.

Gee Cross.—The Hyde Chapel congregation and school are about to place a stained glass window in the chapel as a memorial to the late William Woolley. Many friends, both of Hyde Chapel and elsewhere, have expressed a desire to join in this memorial, and contributions, which are limited to 5s., may be sent to either of the treasurers, Mr. Walter Hudson, Back Bower-lane, Gee Cross, Hyde; and Mr. Harry Oldham, 270, Stockport-road, Gee Cross, Hyde.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. Arthur Hurn, B.A., formerly minister of Acton Unitarian Church, has accepted an invitation to occupy temporarily the position of junior minister of Essex Church, Kensington. Mr. Hurn has undertaken these duties for a period of three months, commencing June 1.

London Guilds' Union.—The annual meeting of the London Guilds' Union was held on Saturday, May 23, at Mansford-street Chapel, the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson presiding. The attendance was small owing to unfavourable weather, but representatives were present from Highgate, Stratford, and Blackfriars. The general secretary reported the usual activities, and the local secretaries gave brief summaries of guild work which included a variety of interests, entertainments to the poor and the crippled, sewing circles, reading circles, lectures on topics of social and literary interest, orchestral work, &c. The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson moved the adoption of the reports. The guild work, he said, should make its members not less manly and vigorous, but help them to realise and develop the religious idea. The Rev. W. J. Piggott was unanimously elected president for the ensuing year. In his brief address he remarked on the need for a new note in the life of the world. Their church was a Christian church, and their guilds should stand for the spirituality of the church. Mr. Philpot was elected secretary and treasurer, and the meeting concluded with a hearty vote of thanks to the retiring officers.

South Cheshire and District Association.—The twenty-fourth annual meeting of the South Cheshire and District Association of Sunday schools and congregations was held at High-street Free Christian Church, Shrewsbury, on Wednesday, the 20th inst., all the churches being represented with the exception of Congleton and Newcastle (Staffs). The chair was taken by the president, the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans, of Chester. The annual report of the committee gave a survey of the ministerial changes during the past year, and expressed their heartiest thanks to the Rev. H. D. Roberts (Liverpool Missionary Association) for the very valuable help he had given to the churches in the Association. The Congregational and Sunday-school reports were, on the whole, encouraging. They could not speak of well-filled churches, but they could and did rejoice in the steadfast faithfulness and unity of the congregations and the zeal and earnestness of their workers. The report and financial statement were adopted on the motion of the Rev. W. Stephens. The Rev. G. Pegler, B.A., moved that the Rev. Dr. W. Griffiths, Ph.D., B.D., be elected president for the ensuing year; and the hon. treasurer (Mr. D. W. Ross, M.A., Nantwich) and the hon. secretary (Mr. Geo. Smith, Shrewsbury) were unanimously re-elected and cordially thanked for their past services. A vote of thanks was also accorded the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans for his services as president during the past year, and for the keen interest he took in the work of the Association. At the conference which followed an address was given by the Rev. J. Park Davies, B.A., B.D., on "Religion and Modern Life," the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, the Rev. W. Stephens, the Rev. G. Pegler, B.A., and Mr. R. Mansell subsequently taking part in the discussion. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. W. Stephens, when an address on "Saintliness" was given by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas.

Stand.—The Rev. Dr. E. Thackray, of Huddersfield, has accepted the invitation of the Unitarian congregation at Stand to become their minister, in succession to the Rev. R. T. Herford, and will commence his duties in September.

The Pioneer Preachers.—The sale of work arranged by the members of the City Temple Prayer Union, to help the Pioneer Preachers to furnish their new home (23, Highbury-place) was held at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, on Thursday last. The occasion was in itself a successful and in some respects a unique event, and the gathering together of Anglicans, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Unitarians, and others in one common interest establishes beyond a doubt the existence of much goodwill towards the little community of preachers. The proceedings were opened by Sir Richard Stapley, on behalf of Lady Stapley, who was unable to be present, after which luncheon was served in the board room, when short speeches were delivered by Sir Richard Stapley, Dr. John Hunter, and Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. The Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., presided. The Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, T. P. Spedding, H. McClelland, and Arthur Bourne were also present, and letters of regret for absence were received from Dr. W. E. Orchard, Dr. Horton, the Rev. E. W. Lewis, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond. A series of four concerts, arranged by the Misses. Colenso and Mrs. Bompus, were a source of great attraction, and were listened to by very appreciative audiences. A pleasing feature of the Coleridge-Taylor concert was the presence of Miss Gwendoline Coleridge-Taylor and Mrs. le Couteur (Miss May Campbell). The Rev. R. J. and Mrs. Campbell have kindly asked the Committee to hold the second sale, which is expected to take place in the early autumn, at their private residence at Ealing to see these innocent animals being driven into a slaughterhouse, where we know they are not only to suffer death, but to be practically in the presence of death maybe for hours and days before their turn comes. To think of this gives humane men and women all the more pain inasmuch that it is quite unnecessary. A little expenditure of money and a little thought would put a stop to a vast amount of suffering." The offer, which includes the proposal to build a suitable building, properly equipped according to the best ideas available on the subject, has been sympathetically received, and we hope it will serve to draw public attention to the fact that legislation in this direction is long overdue.

THE MEMORY OF ELIZABETH FRY.

The life and work of Elizabeth Fry will always be recalled with thankfulness by those who rejoice in the quiet strength of womanhood at its best. A pioneer in social reform she certainly was, with a tenacity of purpose and a supreme indifference to the world's opinion in regard to what was "unladylike" which was none the less potent because they hid themselves under the gentle demeanour of a sweet-faced Quakeress; but these were the fruits of a well-disciplined mind, and a deep and glowing pity for suffering humanity which was partly inherited, and which left no room for any feeling other than divine compassion when she appeared amidst the wretched outcasts of society in the cells and courtyards of Newgate. The great service which Elizabeth Fry rendered to this country as a pioneer of prison reform makes it very appropriate that a statue of her has been placed in the central hall of the Old Bailey, hard by the site of Newgate, to remind men of the noble-hearted woman who made her mission to the prisoners of her day her chief life-work. It will, perhaps, serve to recall those who are occupied in the difficult task of administering justice at the Central Criminal Court to the fact that there is something which counts far more than the majesty of the law in dealing with degraded humanity—the spirit of love which seeks to save and succour what the world has irrevocably condemned.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE HUMANE SLAUGHTERING OF ANIMALS.

Considerable interest has been aroused in Kettering by an offer on the part of Mr. Charles Wicksteed, and Miss Wicksteed, his daughter, to present jointly about 17½ acres of land to the Urban Council for the purposes of building a public abattoir. In a long letter explaining his object Mr. Wicksteed makes it clear that he is moved chiefly by humanitarian reasons. "I believe England is behind most other civilised countries in this matter," he says, "and has been so, in many cases, for generations. When we consider the vast steps that have been made in the direction of humanity in our dealings with animals and human beings during the last 100 years or so, it is indeed deplorable that we have not paid more consideration to the millions of poor brutes which are sacrificed every year, generally in the prime or spring of their lives, to our needs. I think that it is one of the saddest sights that meet us,

THE CHILD AND RELIGION.

In a little pamphlet entitled "Home and the Children," published by the Lindsey Press, Mrs. Alfred Wilson refers to the curious neglect of that natural fount of reverence in the child which is so characteristic of our time, and is, perhaps, an inevitable reaction from the old insistence on "piety," which often put an unwholesome restraint on childish spirits in days which have now happily passed away. At present there is a great reluctance on the part of parents—certainly if they are people of liberal ideas—to put fetters of any kind on the growing intelligence, or to limit the freedom of the child by pointing out what it ought to think or believe. The result is that too often our young people grow up without any definite faith at all, and with a disposition to arrogantly parade a liberty of opinion which they have obtained without suffering or self-sacrifice. Is it surprising, Mrs. Wilson asks, that to such children church-going is a "tiresome duty," or that nothing is discussed after the service but the mannerisms of the minister, the length of the sermon, or the imperfections of the choir? Is it any wonder that the ministers complain of "ill health in our churches," and find it increasingly difficult to keep their hold on the young people when they go out into the world, and mix with others who have grown up in the same modern atmosphere of "think as you please"?

MR. F. J. GOULD'S WORK IN AMERICA.

The large circle of friends and acquaintances who know Mr. F. J. Gould, in connection with his work as Lecturer and Demonstrator for the Moral Education League, or in other capacities, will be glad to hear of his safe return from the United States at the beginning of this month, after a teaching tour of seven months' duration. The tour was organised by Professor F. C. Sharp, of Wisconsin University, with the cordial approval of the Moral Education League, which consented to free Mr. Gould from his regular work in this country for the time being. The nature and extent of Mr. Gould's achievements are summarised admirably in a letter from Professor Sharp to the Secretary of the League, in which he states that Mr. Gould "began his work in Kenosha, Wisconsin, October 6, 1913, and concluded it with a second visit to Washington, D.C., ending April 24, 1914. During this time he visited thirty-one cities. He spent three and a half weeks in New York, two in Philadelphia, and two weeks (in two visits) in Washington, D.C. In fourteen cities he spent one week each. In four cities he spent either three or four days. In the remaining places he spent one day, or in one place two days. In all these places he gave demonstration lessons, using classes of about twenty children, before audiences of teachers, or citizens not connected with school work. His work was extraordinarily successful, and will mark, I think, an epoch in the history of education in the United States. A large number of cities are introducing his methods into their schools, and if their interest continues, his work will represent the real beginning of the moral instruction work on a large scale and in a systematic way in the United States." Besides his demonstration work, Mr. Gould, with some suggestions from Professor Sharp, compiled a manual of moral instruction for the elementary school which is published by the University of Wisconsin.

BRITISH TEMPERANCE WOMEN IN ANNUAL COUNCIL.

The three days' Annual Council and numerous associated gatherings, held in London last week, in connection with the National British Women's Temperance Association, were a striking evidence of the total abstinence principle amongst women, as well as of the excellent propaganda work to which they so efficiently put their hands. Practically the whole of the week was occupied by the 1,264 delegates who were registered as attending in the Kingsway Hall, London. On the Sunday a considerable number of services, P.S.A.'s, &c., were conducted in the Metropolitan area by members of the Council. On the Monday the young people had meetings and conferences, lasting all day and evening. Tuesday was a united Devotional Day for seniors as well as juniors, finishing up with a huge public meeting in the evening, presided over by Mrs. Runciman, and addressed by Mrs. Philip Snowden, Dr. Arthur Evans (who severely condemned the popular "medicated wines"), Mr. Lief Jones, M.P., and Miss Agnes Slack, who has just returned from a successful seven weeks' tour on behalf of total abstinence in Italy.

SCOTTISH FREE CHURCH AND TEMPERANCE.

The United Free Church Assembly meeting at Edinburgh last week held on the Tuesday evening the annual demonstration of its Temperance Union. Sir A. R. Simpson, M.D., who presided, said he would be ashamed of his profession in this twentieth century if he could not guarantee anybody life as healthy without alcohol as with its treacherous aid. The Rev. Maldwyn Hughes, Edinburgh, in a stirring speech, said the State was making provision for unemployment and invalidity, and attempting to stamp out tuberculosis, but that was little more than an attempt to drain the ocean unless the evil of alcoholism was dealt with. Sir Samuel Chisholm, Bart., Glasgow, said the drink evil was one of the mightiest and subtlest enemies which the Church had to combat and overthrow. It was the enemy of progress, the begetter of vice and crime, the irrepressible fountain of misery and shame, and must be swept out of existence entirely. Referring to the Temperance (Scotland) Act, he said if they realised the responsibilities which the new circumstance imposed upon them, there would be victory for temperance over selfish indulgence.

MOHAMMEDAN WOMEN.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, the Indian poetess, recently paid a warm public tribute to the idealism, energy, and courage of Muslim women. Speaking of her own country, she said, the Hindu women are still provincial and somewhat divided by caste; the Muslim woman has the solidarity of her faith, and is developing, even while keeping her veil, the power to overcome obstacles, to organise, and to inspire men. There is not, the Islamic Review points out, a single word in the whole of Islamic literature which warrants the oft-repeated statement that the Holy Prophet declared that woman had no soul. It is one of the calumnies which are so frequently the outcome of uninformed missionary zeal. Some fifty years before the advent of Islam this very question was at issue at the Council of Mæon, where a bishop raised the question whether woman was really a human being. Fortunately, the decision of the majority was in her favour, though some fathers of the Church maintained that womanhood only belonged to this world.

It was to destroy the false notions of those days that Alquran emphasised woman's personal right to enter into the Kingdom of God in these words, "Enter into paradise ye and your wives, whoso doeth the things that are right, whether male or female, and is a believer, shall enter into paradise." We are also reminded that it is a woman and not a man, the daughter of the Prophet, who has been called Fatima-tuz-zahra, the Light of Paradise, and Khatoon-i-Jennat, the Lady of Paradise. In another part of the Koran reference is made to "the men who resign themselves to God, and the women who resign themselves, the believing men and the believing women, the devout men and the devout women, the men of truth and the women of truth, the patient men and the patient women, and so on, for both of whom God hath prepared forgiveness and a rich recompense."

Masters' Tournament at St. Petersburg.—As is well known, the first prize-winner is the world's champion, E. Lasker. Great interest was taken in the contest, since Capablanca, the renowned Cuban genius, was one of the players. His struggle with Lasker was particularly momentous, in view of the controversy which raged a while back in connection with a match between these two players for the great title. In the Lasker-Capablanca game the latter practically lost his chance of first prize by accidentally touching the wrong R, and being, of course, compelled to move it, immediately drifted into a losing position. So slender a chance as this seems to have made all the difference in the final results. It is once again apparent how small a place English masters take in international play. It is admitted on all hands that our countrymen have no chance whatever against the Oriental races. Lasker and Rubinstein are Jews. It seems that Russia is nearly pre-eminent so far as chess masters are concerned. St. Petersburg is a hot-bed of fine players who seem to devote their whole lives to the study of chess. Rubinstein, particularly, so I understand, does nothing else from morning till night. So far as problem composers are concerned, England can hold her own. Two of the greatest artists are Godfrey Heathcote and P. F. Blake, whose position in this direction is unassailable. To my mind the greatest of all was A. F. Mackenzie, of Jamaica.

THE MODERN SPIRIT IN RELIGION

THIS ANNOUNCEMENT is of particular interest to all who would discern aright the modern spirit in religion. To the Student, the Preacher, the Tutor, the Sunday-school Teacher—indeed, to every active worker in the field of Christian Progress—it is superlatively important that he should rightly assess the reality of Bible truths and the transcendent value of their influence on the problems of to-day.

To the seeker after truth who desires to arrive at a fair and square conclusion respecting the traditions of religion, the volumes hereafter referred to are calculated to be of outstanding use because they frankly and fearlessly deal with modern difficulties and are absolutely abreast of modern research and thought. They are the only undertaking of the kind in the English language.

THE CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

"An admirable series of prime importance."—Rev. Prin. P. T. Forsyth.

In this series of volumes the whole field of theological inquiry is covered by men of world-wide repute as specialists. Each writer has been careful to give due regard to the arguments on both sides, thereby dealing in a really satisfying way with religious problems in the light of modern research and thought. At the same time, a reverent and liberal atmosphere is preserved throughout.

The scope is designedly comprehensive, the range including academic and archaeological researches into the earliest Bible records and comparative, as well as contemporaneous, history; evidential and historical treatises upon specific periods; Christological, Eschatological, Mystical and Ethical contributions, and books on Monasticism, Modernism, Scientific religious analyses, philosophical considerations of religion, &c.

THE THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION LIBRARY.

Is a series on a more academic plane. It is complementary to the Crown Theological Library, though forming a self-contained and embracing group in itself.

Convincing in their arguments and evidence, scholarly in tone, irreproachable as authentic translations by experts of works of eminent theological professors, the books in this Library provide the English-speaking public with the best results of recent theological investigations, without reference to doctrinal considerations and with the sole purpose of arriving at the truth.

The Library is a selection of unimpeachably brilliant translations of the writings of men of outstanding authority, covering an exceptionally wide range and absolutely level with the latest developments and discoveries.

A 40-PAGE BROCHURE GIVEN FREE.

MORE ADEQUATELY to describe these volumes, a handsome forty-page brochure, neatly bound and containing many portraits of famous theologians and professors, has been prepared. It can be obtained FREE by returning the attached coupon filled in as directed, and will provide much interesting reading upon 'The Theological Balance and Current Thought,' as it is entitled. There is sure to be a rush: make certain of your copy by sending to-day.

This book is concerned with certain great questions which lie behind all forms of religion and with which all forms of religion are more or less closely bound up.

The questions are such as these: "What are we?" "Is there such a being as God, and if so, what is His nature?" "How are we related to God?" "What is the nature of this universe in which we find ourselves?" "What do we mean by such words as 'Matter' and 'Spirit'?" "What is the meaning and object of our lives?"

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE sinking of the Empress of Ireland with its appalling list of victims has filled the public mind during the past week to the exclusion of most other topics. In the comments upon the disaster there has been a welcome absence of moralising. The tragedies of human fate speak their own message to the Christian heart, and words usually only weaken their impressiveness. Here we would only express the deep feeling of a common pity and sorrow for those who have suffered grievous personal loss, and especially for our comrades and fellow-workers in the cause of Christ belonging to the Salvation Army. Seldom, since the days of active persecution, has any branch of the Church suffered so severely in the cutting off of a whole regiment of picked men and women. The work of the Salvation Army in Canada has been suddenly bereft of most of its trusted leaders; but within a few hours of the shipwreck steps were taken, with a quiet courage, to supply their places. Movements that are really guided by faith are seldom dismayed.

WE record with lively satisfaction the appointment of Dr. J. E. Carpenter to the Wilde Readership in Natural and Comparative Religion at Oxford, and also that of Dr. G. Buchanan Gray, of Mansfield College, to be Speaker's Lecturer in Biblical Studies. The selection of these distinguished Nonconformist scholars to be public teachers of the University on subjects definitely connected with religion is a remarkable victory for theological freedom. Not only does it make the present Anglican restrictions upon divinity degrees ridiculous; it will also prepare the way for the removal of tests from the theological professorships. We do not expect this final act of liberation to take place just yet, for many prejudices and vested interests still stand in the way. But the imposition of tests upon any branch of the teaching profession is doomed; for it is seen to be intellectually absurd and subversive of sincere devotion to knowledge for its own sake.

THE Essex Hall Lecture by the Dean of St. Paul's on Wednesday was one of the independent and stimulating utterances which we are always glad to receive from him. With a quiet note of sarcasm, he passed in review some of the anti-intellectual tendencies of the day and the strange revival of many forms of superstition. "Thinking is hard work," he said, "what a joy to hear that it is most of it waste of time!"—an opinion which emphatically he did not share. Passing on to the harder task of constructive suggestion, he pleaded for the religious value of the ordered universe which science has revealed to us. "If God seems to do nothing, it is really because he does everything." At the same time he indicated his own complete freedom from theories of mechanical necessity in the words: "There is no fixed quantity of spiritual energy in the world. We can get more of it without abstracting an equivalent amount from elsewhere." But this does not mean that, with some modern teachers, we must surrender to the sway of impulse without order or purpose. "The votary of human freedom has no need to postulate a wild universe with William James. The world is free because its Creator is free."

It was no doubt easier for the reporter to seize upon some of Dr. Inge's obiter dicta, half humorous, half sarcastic, in the earlier part of his lecture, than to follow the philosophical argument based upon a deep study of Plotinus which followed. But the result is that some of the short reports which have appeared in the press are entirely out of perspective. They seem almost to imply that he was inveighing against the intellectuals and lending some countenance to the very things against which his whole lecture was an impressive warning. The Daily News and Leader appeared on Thursday morning with this amazing head-line, "Present Day Belief in Miracles. 'Gloomy Dean's' Bright Speech to Unitarians." In itself the description is simply ludicrous, and we are at a loss to understand how any newspaper which retains a vestige of intellectual self-respect can indulge in this kind of gratuitous rudeness to a man, who stands head and shoulders above most religious teachers of our day in independence of mind and the resolute refusal to administer sentimental sedatives at a time when both the Church and the world need to be stung into the energy of thought.

At a meeting of the Committee of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Churches held this week the welcome announcement was made that the appeal for £50,000 for the Sustentation Fund has been entirely successful. This will enable the salaries of ministers all over the country to be placed upon a more satisfactory basis and to be raised to a minimum scale. In itself the sum is not a large one, but its value must be estimated by the amount of good which can be done with it. Many people would regard the income of the whole fund as no more than an adequate provision for their personal wants; but the same amount of money diverted into communal channels will bring new hope to a large number of ministers of religion all over the country. It will help to lift the burden of financial anxiety in times of sickness. It will enable them to educate their children more worthily. And in many other quiet and simple ways it will bring means of escape from poverty, which is often more cramping than ennobling. "The workman is worthy of his hire."

WE have some means of knowing the amount of enthusiasm and hard work which have been bestowed upon this task of raising £50,000 in two years. The donors have given gladly, and we are sure that it is no small gratification to them to feel that they have helped according to their ability. But to the able trio upon whom the chief burden of the work has fallen some expression of heartfelt gratitude is more than due. The Rev. H. E. Dowson has shown himself a prince of beggars, and the Secretary, the Rev. J. Harwood, and the Treasurer, Mr. F. W. Monks, have given lavishly of their time and business ability. Two other names should also be mentioned with gratitude. Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone, the President of the Conference, has shown a close personal interest in the Fund, and may well congratulate himself upon its completion during his presidency. The Rev. J. Wood, a former President of the Conference, was the first to bring the matter prominently before the churches. To-day he is happy in the realisation of his dream.

WE hope that Mrs. Besant's important letter to the Times on India and the Empire will receive the attention it deserves. Those who are able to think in closed compartments and leave the most thorny problems of government to the suave decisions of the official mind may possibly dismiss it as the opinion of an amateur. But we are sure that a large number of intelligent people is conscious of new and difficult problems looming on the horizon which are essentially their concern, for they involve fundamental questions of ethics and international equity. As Mrs. Besant points out, the severe check which has been placed recently by Colonial sentiment upon the right of Indians to travel freely throughout the Empire and to settle in it where they will, has aroused deep feeling in India; and it is only part of the much larger problem, whether Indians are to be treated as a subject race under the yoke of disabilities which we should consider highly prejudicial to the best interests of freedom among ourselves.

MRS. BESANT affirms that England has adopted recently in India methods of repression which formerly she condemned severely in others.

"Repression of free speech, prohibition of public meetings, securities from the press forfeited by the arbitrary will of the Executive, house-searchings by the police, deportation without trial, detention in prison without trial, proclamation of districts entailing the necessity of obtaining permission for any public meeting, police espionage, &c., Russian methods used by free England, and the forfeiture of the freedom of all law-abiding people because a few desperadoes have committed crimes."

The facts about the Press Law are equally disquieting, and the bad arguments which are put forward in its defence were quite familiar in England a few generations ago. "The Press Act," Mrs. Besant writes, "must be abolished, and Press criticism must not be regarded as sedition. The sweeping clauses of the Act can catch legitimate criticism within the net of sedition, and every Indian editor lives under the sword of Damocles. The promise of protection by the revision of the High Court has proved to be a delusion, and amendment at least should be granted if abolition be refused."

MRS. BESANT closes her letter on a note of serious warning if the legitimate claims of India are disregarded:—

"Now that there is talk of federating the Empire, this question of India becomes pressing. Great Britain, Ireland, the Colonies, are spoken of as federated countries; India is always left out. If she is shut out of the Empire as a self-governing country, will she be to blame if she refuses to remain in it as a dependency? If her sons are shut out of the Colonies, will she be to blame if she shuts out all colonials? If the white man lords it over the Asiatic outside Asia, shall not the Asiatic be at least his own master within Asia? The educated Indian is a highly cultured, courteous, noble-hearted, patriotic gentleman; is he always to be shut out from the best in his own country? Is he never to be free among free men? Is he never to be estimated by his character, his brain, and his heart, but always by the colour of his skin? There is no finer class in the Empire than that composed of the educated Indians. They offer an intelligent loyalty, the loyalty of citizens and of free men. Will it be for the Empire if it rejects their love and disregards their loyalty. For India is awakened into national self-consciousness, and her tie with Great Britain can only be preserved by her freedom. Free, she will be the buttress of the Empire; subject, she will be a perpetual menace to its stability."

AFTER the controversies and sharp political divisions of recent years, it is pleasant to recognise in the Lord Milner of to-day the friend of Arnold Toynbee, still unchanged in his social sympathies. In the speech which he made last week to the British Section of the International Association for Labour Legislation, he associated himself in uncompromising terms with the campaign against sweating, and expressed his conviction that it was thoroughly sound from the economic point of view.

"In struggling to put an end to sweating," he said, "I believe we are striving for something absolutely attainable in the existing economic conditions of the country. I am convinced that there is no industry worth maintaining which requires sweating for its preservation or even for its prosperity. Industry carried on under these conditions is from the national point of view thoroughly bad business." "Just think," he continued, "what the position of a nation would be that could say there is no degrading work and no one in the country who doesn't receive sufficient remuneration to enable him to live a decent tolerable human life."

IN his address to the British Institute of Social Service last week Mr. Balfour laid special stress upon the advantages to be derived from the careful study of the experience of other countries. Sometimes, he said, in moments of hasty generalisation we attributed some social evil to special circumstances or traditions of our own, and sometimes, no doubt, we might be right. But often we should find that countries where those special circumstances and traditions were not to be found yet suffered from exactly the same evils. The discovery of that fact would prevent our making a wrong diagnosis of our own evils, for it would be seen that they rested on a broader basis than the particular experience of a particular country, and that they were evils really incident to a particular stage in the general evolution of civilised society. That was a valuable result to arrive at. It prevented rash experiment; it did not discourage careful and sober efforts to deal with these evils as they arose.

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF GARDEN CITY.

MUCH interest centres round every new community that is being built up on a sufficiently broad basis to manifest, in its full expression, the spirit of the age. Its constitution and general tendencies are a revelation, in some degree, of what the future development of the older communities will lead to. For the new social organism will be, in large measure, made conformable to the scientific knowledge and the philosophical and religious conceptions of the day. It will be, in its novel features, an outgrowth from conditions reached through long experience, and, therefore, indicative of the direction in which the social mind is tending. The interest awakened by these efforts to deal with life's problems with more freedom than an old community can command is intensified when the task is viewed from a religious standpoint, i.e., when our object is to discover the trend of religious thought and the set of religious practice. For the conditions of the spiritual life in the changing world of to-day invest these shadows of coming reforms with a degree of importance that transcends all other considerations.

Letchworth, the first Garden City, occupies a unique position among new communities; for collected within its borders are all sorts and conditions of persons belonging to the classes which may be generally described as "intellectual." A fairly representative body, these form the nucleus of a rapidly growing community unhampered by the traditional limitations to which older societies are subject. Brought together by a desire for freer and fuller individual expression, a larger life, the average level of thought and moral sentiment is presumably higher than, perhaps, anywhere else in the country. And as all real progress is made from the average level, we are justified in looking into the social and religious life of this new community for signs of things to come. Chief among these things is the religious reformation, the reconstruction of the old form of the faith, necessary to enable Christianity to regain its hold on the modern mind. To the unprejudiced eye seeking for evidence concerning this vital question, the signs of such a reconstruction are multiplying. The movement is not so much the expression of a desire to satisfy an intellectual need—though it is that in large measure—as the outcome of an awakening of man's deeper nature, the humanly emotional and the spiritual. Its motive is a yearning for a higher expression of life than the pursuit of material gain, or even the striving after greater intellectual power. The movement here is in no wise different in character from what is going on in other places. Its claim to special attention rests on the fact that here, perhaps, more than anywhere else, its progress and tendencies may be clearly perceived. The nebulous elements of the new thought engendered by the conflict between authority and free-thinking are moving in visibly lessening orbits to consolidate into a tangible and definite body of doctrines. That is to say, the re-ordering of the confused elements of religious faith has proceeded a little farther in this city of vigorous and original thinkers than in the older communities bound by traditions and conventional laws.

Ethical considerations are now uppermost in the public mind. Social relationships rather than religious doctrines are stirring the thought of to-day. Religion and business have been kept so completely apart that the identity of the fundamental principles of religion and ethics has dropped out of sight. The evil consequences in lax morality have made necessary a reconstruction, not only of the social organism, but of forms of faith as well. For the progress of modern thought and the growth of the democratic spirit have brought disharmony between the ideals of democracy and the attitude of the churches towards social and industrial relations. Through the democratic movement, humanity is seeking more abundant life, and its way of attainment lies through the practical realisation of brotherhood. This is the plain teaching of the Gospels, but it has been left to the non-ecclesiastical elements of society to proclaim it as the only effective remedy for the evils which affect the whole civilised world of to-day. The changes in ethical values, however, which the wider recognition of this spiritual truth has brought about is re-acting upon our conception of religion and bringing it into conformity with the loftier ideals which a quickened moral sense is setting up. This may seem at first sight to be a reversal of the natural order of things, for we are accustomed to look to religion to purify and raise the moral sense. But a deeper view will reveal an upwelling of spiritual force whose effects are first felt in the social organism, because there the tension of strained relationships has produced a hyper-sensitiveness that responds readily to the stimulant.

In the peculiar conditions of the Garden City this evolutionary social movement has become accentuated in a degree not reached elsewhere. The influence of its reaction on the religious life is here clearly marked. The free discussions of the Adult Schools, the friendly questioning of the Brotherhood Associations, and the unconventional methods of some independent religious organisations are more distinctly outstanding features of the communal life than church membership, or the ordinary forms of public worship. Therefore, in these "outside" activities we may most surely discern the trend of religious feeling. The Adult Schools are in no way associated with Church organisation. And though this cannot be said of one of the Brotherhood bodies, it is established on an independent basis and works with the utmost freedom from theological bias. The best evidence of the liberty of thought allowed and the progressive views held in these semi-religious associations is to be found in the varied type of persons who preside over, or otherwise take part in, their Sunday meetings, and the widely divergent opinions which there find expression. An Adult School discussion in this unconventional town is a mind-awakening experience. There are points, however, on which remarkable unanimity of feeling and belief is manifested. All are agreed that laborare est orare, that the truest form of divine worship is the daily task well and faithfully performed, and that the worthiest service of God is the willing service of our fellow-men. The "Guild of Help" is a bond of union for the most diverse theological opinions. Religious feeling can find its active expression only in social service. Here social relationships and industrial conditions are regarded, not merely as coming within the scope of practical religion, but as aspects of the spiritual life. Since the domain of religious thought is not here hedged in by traditional authority, and since, moreover, ethical problems have now an absorbing interest, points of difference in theological conceptions, differences in the expression of truth in terms of the intellect, have not the dividing and separative effects which an unquestioning allegiance to dogmatic Christianity gives rise to. Therefore we find a tolerant attitude becoming a noteworthy feature of this community—the promise of a wide tolerance as a characteristic mark of the practical religion of to-morrow.

The modifying and directive influence of all this on church life and work is discernible in the teaching and in the various activities of those institutions in which what is called "orthodoxy" has entrenched itself. The arrogance and aggressive dogmatism so painfully conspicuous among these old-established organisations find here an uncongenial atmosphere to which they accommodate themselves by a less obtrusive attitude. These still powerful organisations are further led, or forced, into the current of feeling which finds an outlet in service. In this way their exclusiveness is being broken down, and federative co-operation rendered possible. Here, again, the influences operative in the religious world are tending, if not to unity, at least to mutually helpful concurrence. This widening of the field of organised religious effort is nowhere more plainly seen than in the Garden City, which, though not the birth-place, is in its welcome to the system becoming the home of the Institutional Church; another indication of the trend of the spiritual awakening that is renewing the life of society. In these developments, largely along ethical lines, we see the coming of a church of the people, a democratic institution, expressive in the breadth of its sympathies of the mind of the Christ.

A feature of the religious life under these freer conditions that may not be overlooked is a tendency to form numerous relatively small groups acting independently, but not in opposition or rivalry. This exhibition of individual responsibility seems to be a phase of the decentralising movement to which freedom of thought in all departments of knowledge has given rise. Does it point to the complete overthrow of priestly authority in the all-comprehending church of the future? What seems to be certain about the New Catholicism is, that it will leave "to each man his own vision," that it will not make the salvation of the individual its primary object, nor disassociate religion from the world's work.

G. G. ANDRÉ.

THE EARLY FOLK-SINGERS.

To dip into "Essays in the Study of Folk-Songs" by the Countess Martinengo-Cesaresco, originally published in 1886, and now included in Everyman's Library (London: J. M. Dent & Sons, ls.), is to be once more refreshed by contact with primitive minds rich in imaginative power, and with the dew of the early world fresh upon them, from whence all poetry and legend have sprung. We talk much in these days of progress and the growth of civilisation, as if it were the height of human achievement to get things done by machinery which were once produced by the sensitive hands of the craftsman, and to cover the countryside with factories in which bodies and souls are daily destroyed in the name of commerce; but it is well to be reminded occasionally that our new gods demand heavy sacrifices, and that not least among these is the simple dramatic instinct, the dignity born of creative labour, the wholesome blitheness of heart which is so quickly vulgarised, if it is not killed outright, by artificial surroundings, which we have so largely lost. "The unsophisticated man," says Goethe, "is more the master of direct, effective expression in few words than he who has received a regular literary education," and certain it is that the great charm of folk-songs and folk tales, which were meant to be repeated and sung, but not written down, lies in the fact that they were never "got up" or designed for publication in choice editions, but were the natural and inevitable expression of emotion, as well as the chief source of patriotic inspiration in days when men felt strongly and were full of the childlike spirit of wonder.

It is the very earnestness with which the "natural man" weaves his thoughts of life and death, of the waxing and waning of the seasons, of sin and forgiveness, and love and hate into his rhymes and ballads that makes them so enchanting, as when the harvesters "in the hot cornfield of the Phrygian king" framed their Litières songs, or the performers of Mysteries and Miracle Plays enacted the solemn tragedy of their Lord, or the Breton peasants made a drama out of the doings of a certain Count William (Saint Guillaume of Poitou) who after a wicked life is very thoroughly converted and becomes a model of piety, or the native versifiers of the southern nations wove their romantic passions into chansons and lyrics of extraordinary fervour and sincerity. People who are profoundly interested in what they are doing, in the variety of their daily experiences, in the never-ending interplay of cause and effect which is seen at work as clearly in the springing corn as in the growing child, are never dull; they are, indeed, far oftener than we imagine, of the stuff whereof poets are made, though mute and inglorious in a world too sophisticated to understand them. Think, to take one instance alone, of the yearnings and questionings, the weeping and awe, the faith and love, the symbolism and ritual which were the tribute of primitive people to the mystery of death—that shadowy presence which meets the human soul at every turn, and leads it trembling to the borders of the unknown. Death is one of the commonest incidents in the experience of mankind but it "moves and excites our spiritual consciousness as nothing else can do," and to be indifferent to it and the suffering it creates is a sign of callousness rather than mental superiority in the stage of evolution to which most of us belong. Only when we have passed beyond the illusions of the lower self—this Maya that weaves its veils about us and keeps us fettered to the things of the flesh—shall we cease to think without dread of that "Lord of terrible aspect," and fully realise that the smile upon his face is the smile of God himself. The early singers of the human race had not reached this point; for them the glamour of the earth and the strength of their desires were at their height, and it was just because death interfered so frequently and so unexpectedly with their joyous activities that it became a thing to wonder about with all the aching sorrow of ignorance and fear. It became, also, "the symbol of a human oneness with the coming and going of day and night, summer and winter, the rising and receding tide. It caused even the rudest of men to tread more softly, revealing to him unawares the angel Reverence." And the havoc which it wrought was chronicled in poignant rhymes that seem the natural language of grief, for, as a Greek folk-singer has put it, "songs are the words spoken by those who suffer."

In the chapter on Nature folk-songs we come upon the faint track of many ancient ideas and beliefs which the writer of these essays has dealt with more fully in a later book, and which, strangely enough, are once more being received with a certain sympathy in an age which is commonly supposed to be devoted solely to scientific research and the pursuit of material wealth. The faint track, we say, for these indications are not followed up, because it is the purpose of the author to gather together as many curious facts, legends and tales as she possibly can for the benefit of the student without pausing to discourse philosophically upon their hidden meaning, or the religious cults with which they were often associated. Yet what a world of suggestion often lies behind these simple and childish imaginings! How frequently they seem to touch upon those profound cosmic mysteries which have exercised the minds of great thinkers for thousands of years! The Lithuanians, who have invented such tender star-idylls, "have not wholly left that stage in man's development," says the Countess Martinengo-Cesaresco, "when what is imagined seems prima facie quite as likely to be real as what is seen"; and neither, we hope, has she. For it becomes more and more difficult, especially for those who live constantly on the edges of vision, to set a limit to reality, or to assert that the things whereof we dream do not contribute more to our immortal life than the tangible things we can touch and hold. "The world as imagination sees it is the durable world," says a modern poet with the seer's insight, and if imagination means the higher creative and mystical faculty by which we arrive at truth through the intuition rather than by an intellectual process, why should this be disputed? There is much pathos and significance in the story of the man who dwelt on an island near the coast of Greenland. A contented soul was he, whose chief joy was to see the sun rising, but when his boy came to years of discretion he persuaded his father to set out in a boat so that he might see a little of the world—the perpetual craving of the young in every age and country. No sooner, however, had they passed Cape Farewell than he saw the sun beginning to rise behind the land. "It was more than he could bear, and he set off at once for his home. Next morning very early he went out of his tent; he did not come back. When he was sought after he was found quite dead. The joy of seeing the sun rising again out of the sea had killed him." Truly a happy death was that, indeed, no death at all, but the beginning of a quest far more eventful than any imagined by the eager lad, who did not yet know that there is that in man which can range over the Universe while the body remains a prisoner in the "home" it loves.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RELIGION AND THE SUPERNORMAL.

SIR,—Perhaps through the medium of your columns I may be allowed to address a few remarks to the writer of the articles on "Religion and the Supernormal," which I have read with keen interest. I am somewhat puzzled by Miss Crafer's indefinite use of the terms "spiritual" and "mental." In the first centuries of the Church's history Spiritual Healing by the laying on of hands was a recognised practice, having its origin in the gifts of healing bestowed by Christ on His followers. To regard the modern attempt to re-vivify such unquestioned gifts as a "pain-shunning cult," which uses as its instrument the "power of prayer," is surely an impossible attitude of mind. Perhaps your contributor does not intend to include Spiritual Healing in her criticism of Mental Healing and New Thought Philosophy; but in that case she should make her position clear. Her closing reference to the Spiritual Healing Report naturally leads one to suppose she is using the terms mind and spirit as if they were synonymous. Miss Crafer admits without reservation the control of mind (or should we say "spirit"?) over matter, but asserts its "right place" to be one of "subservience to other elements" in Christianity. Is not this rather as if we acknowledged the power of an explosive in blasting rock but used it as a subservient auxiliary to our friend the pick-axe.

It would seem your contributor considers a refusal to acquiesce ungrudgingly in the continuance of bodily pain equivalent to a refusal to bear with Christ the cross of suffering. Physical pain is but a part—and not the greater part—of the "old woe o' the world." The Saviour of the race is heralded through the ages as "A man of Sorrows" and acquainted with "Grief," rather than as the Bearer of Pain; it is through mental and spiritual torture that His victory is won. In His words "Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils," He leaves His disciples a direct command to destroy pain for others, to rebuild and restore these "temples of the Living God"; but He warns them that Suffering shall still be theirs, though on a higher plane—"In the world ye shall have tribulation." If physical suffering could be suddenly blotted out like a figure from a slate, "sorrow and acquaintance with grief" would still lead the pilgrim to Calvary. I am inclined to question the authority on which Miss Crafer claims that those who seek to kill the power of pain, to heal "the wounds of humanity," regard with impatience the endurance of Christ: rather it is their inspiration, they see in that supreme sacrifice the death-blow of decay and perversion, the challenge to life on the spiritual plane.—Yours, &c.,

PUBLIC WORSHIP.

SIR,—Some time ago a special committee appointed by the Committee of the National Conference addressed a number of questions relating to Public Worship, &c., to ministers, secretaries of congregations and district associations, and some other friends. Replies were requested by June 1. As there are still a good many to come in, may I ask, through your columns, that they may kindly be sent to me with as little delay as possible?—Yours, &c.,

SUMMER SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SERVICE.

SIR,—May I call the attention of your readers to the forthcoming United Summer School of Social Service Unions, to be held at Swanwick from June 20 to 29. Swanwick is already becoming a household word, and among the most valuable gatherings have been those in which the members of different churches have met to consider matters of common interest. The atmosphere of frank companionship and friendliness is most to be welcomed when it joins those who have passed most of their life, religiously, in separate "compartments." This Summer School, as the similar ones held the last two years, will be attended by Anglicans, Roman Catholics, and members of all the Nonconformist Churches. The Lord Bishop of Oxford is the President of the Conference, and will give an address on Sunday afternoon. On the same platform will be the Rev. Dr. Garvie and the Rev. Charles Plater, S.J. The discussions during the week will deal with the subject of "Land and Labour," a subject of urgent and vital importance to the churches and to the nation at the present time. Papers will be read by such distinguished authorities as Mr. H. G. Wood, Professor W. J. Ashley, Mr. George Edwards, Mr. Charles Roden Buxton, Mr. P. Lloyd-Greame, Mr. Christopher Turnor, Mr. J. Nugent Harris, Mr. B. Seeböhm Rowntree, Mr. Raymond Unwin,

Mr. J. W. Hills, M.P., Mr. E. Richard Cross, Lord Henry Bentinck, M.P., Mr. J. St. George Heath. Full time is reserved for questions and discussions; and as workers from many environments will be present, the discussions will be of the greatest interest and value. But the most important feature of the School is that the problem is discussed with a definitely Christian understanding and purpose, in order to emphasise the underlying spiritual significance of all true social reform. It is no attempt to advocate a specific remedy; it is a means of turning the light of Christian experience and conviction on one of the obscurest and most urgent problems that the Christian Church of to-day has to face. I shall be pleased to give further information to any who desire it.—Yours, &c.,

A NEW FRENCH TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE.

SIR,—The Société Biblique de France have announced their intention to celebrate the centenary of the Society in 1918 by the issue of a new French translation of the Bible. They have further issued a specimen sheet, showing that they intend to adopt the results of the higher criticism of the Old Testament, and to place the letters J. E. D. and P. in the margin to indicate the writers so denoted. Their statement of intention as to the New Testament, however, is not equally clear; and I have just sent a letter to the editor of Evangile et Liberte advising them to make a translation of the Sinaitic manuscript, giving translations of the other principal manuscripts and versions in the notes. I have said that our Revised Version was spoilt by the fact that the Revisers felt themselves at liberty to adopt sometimes the reading of one manuscript and sometimes that of another; and that in exercising that liberty they were influenced by their theological preferences. If the Sinaitic manuscript were adopted for the basis of translation, there would be no scope for such a tendency to manifest itself. A letter from an individual like myself may receive scant attention; but if the B. and F. U. A. and other religious associations in this country made similar representations, their advice might be followed.—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

BEAUTY WITHIN.

WHEN we were little children we were very fond of collecting. We collected stamps and coins, and shells and dead beetles and leaves. The leaves used to fall off the virginia creeper which covered our house, and the colours were so beautiful, red and orange or a deep purple tint, that we longed to keep them safely hidden away. We used to put them into our favourite books, and squeeze the books into a very tight corner of the bookshelf; this used to press the leaves. Then as we grew older, and busier with school work, we collected friends instead, and so the old friendly leaves were forgotten, though they still stayed in their places in the books. Perhaps they knew that one day we should want them again, and did their best to keep young and fresh so that we should still think them beautiful when we took them out. But it is difficult to keep young and fresh when you are cut away from your own home, and, of course, when the years went by and nobody came the leaves began to die away. About twenty years afterwards I was moving the books from one house to another, and dropped one of these old books on the floor. Out tumbled the old leaf I had placed there so long ago, but it was so changed that I hardly knew it. It had gone into its place a beautiful red and gold leaf, glossy and bright; it came out nothing but a thin skeleton, a delicate lace framework of veins on which the outside beauty, the body of the leaf, had rested and lived. All the old beauty had gone, but as I held the skeleton up against the light, and then put it down on a piece of white paper, all the wonderful beauty of the veins stood out so plainly that I thought the beauty inside the leaf was far greater than the beauty of the leaf as I had known it. It was all so regular, all so perfect; the main great vein, like a tree trunk up the centre, with branches out at regular intervals, on every side, and each branch dividing off into little branches, and feathery veins, all as true and regular as possible. It was more like a piece of beautiful lace than a leaf; it was a pleasure to look at it. Of course it had been there all the time, or the leaf could never have lived and caught my eye with its beauty; it was only as age wore the outside cover away that I saw the beauty within, the foundation of it all.

I wonder if anyone will ever see the beauty that is the foundation of our lives. We ought to have a beautiful framework of soul upon which our character is built. Just as our body is beautiful, and built on a foundation framework, which is, indeed, beautiful too in all its contrivances and compactness, so our characters, if beautiful, rest on a framework more beautiful still, the soul. This is the beauty within. Sometimes people forget that, and think only of the beauty that can be seen; they forget that if there is beauty within, some day it must shine the more brightly as the outside form dies away, or if there is no beauty within, and only horror and treachery, then some day as the outside beauty dies the inner falseness becomes visible in all its shame.

There was once a gaoler on guard at a Paris prison whose duty it was to guard a Queen who was a prisoner there. He had been sent there by the Republicans, who wanted to keep her in prison. Outside the prison there were some Royalists, who wished to see her free, and bring her over to England. They laid their plans well, and gradually won over all the gaolers to their side. This gaoler, Tison, was one whom they trusted, and he seemed always one of the kindest to the Queen, and they thought him as kind as he seemed. But he was double-faced. He knew that the Republicans would reward him if he told them of the plot to rescue the Queen; and he kept on taking money from the Royalists so that they thought he was still their friend. So they came to the day when the escape was arranged, and they sent in a letter to the Queen telling her what she was to do. They had sent her letters before to warn her to be ready; these letters were written on little scraps of paper in invisible ink. The Queen used to take them near the stove or the lamp, and the heat from the flame used to make the letters stand out on the paper, and then she could read the message. And Tison had watched her. So one day the temptation to earn the Republican reward was too strong for him; though he had pledged himself to help the Queen to escape, the temptation, like the fire, brought out some hidden villainy in him that perhaps he had not known to be there. His real character came out, and showed how much shame and ugliness the outside beauty concealed. He took the Royalist letter to the Republican officials, and at once the plot was foiled. The poor Queen was separated from her little son, some of those who had plotted to set her free were sent to the scaffold and beheaded, and Tison, the double-faced, got his reward. Beauty there may have been outside, but you cannot think that a man who is friend one minute, and traitor the next, is beautiful inside. The old proverb, after all, is true which says, "False friends are like our shadows; they keep close to us whilst we walk in the sunshine, but leave us the instant we step into the shade."

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MRS. JOHN LUPTON.

By the death of Mrs. Lupton, which took place on May 29, the Mill Hill congregation at Leeds loses its last living link with the old Presbyterian Meeting House, which was taken down in 1847 to be replaced by the present Gothic church. She was also the last survivor in her generation of two large and influential families which were in their day a mainstay of Mill Hill and the cause it represents—the Bucktons, to which she belonged by birth, and the Luptons, into which she married.

It is high praise to say of her that she was a worthy representative of "the sweet and sainted womanhood" of the past: diligent in her home, actively interested in school and chapel and educational work, courteous, hospitable, kindly to all, one might almost say a perfect wife, mother, hostess, friend. The times have changed, and old beliefs alter, but the type remains, and there are not wanting to us women as good and sweet and reliable as any of the generation which has accomplished its work and gone its way.

MR. A. G. MAGINNIS.

AMONG the passengers who lost their lives by the wreck of the Empress of Ireland was Mr. A. Gordon Maginnis, of Putney. The youngest son of the late Rev. David Maginnis, formerly of Belfast and Stourbridge, he had a wide circle of friends, who, with his bereaved family, deeply mourn his death. Mr. Maginnis was a director of the firm of Messrs. Mappin & Webb, and was on his return from a short business tour. A man of great capacity in commercial affairs, he had a quiet and pleasant temperament, which, combined with his genuine character, won for him a respect that universally ripened into attachment; and scores of tenderly sympathetic letters received by his relatives, from writers of the most diverse positions in life, show how warm that attachment was. For many years he had been a faithful supporter of the Unitarian Church, Wandsworth, serving recently on its committee; he was also a member of the Layman's Club. Blended with the sorrow and pain inevitable in a parting so sudden and a loss so great, his friends will cherish a grateful feeling that he so worthily stood for that life of integrity, considerate kindness, and reverent habit, which is characteristic of the true gentleman. He was unmarried; a sister and two brothers survive him.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE ESSEX HALL LECTURE.

DR. INGE ON PHILOSOPHICAL MYSTICISM.

The Essex Hall Lecture was delivered on Wednesday morning to a crowded audience by the Very Rev. W. R. Inge, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's. His subject was "The Religious Philosophy of Plotinus and Some Modern Philosophies of Religion." The President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. G. H. Leigh, presided, and was supported on the platform, among others, by Dr. Clifford, Dr. Drummond, Principal Carpenter, Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., the Rev. Charles Hargrove, Dr. J. E. Odgers, and Mr. Charles Hawksley.

After a few words of cordial welcome by Mr. Leigh, Dr. Inge was given an enthusiastic reception. He at once began a deeply interesting survey of some of the more recent religious philosophies that appear to have landed modern thinkers in a kind of impasse, from which the only escape may lie in the theories of philosophical mysticism of which Plotinus was one of the greatest exponents. In an age like our own, he said, when knowledge is so much specialised, there is a danger lest its votaries should lose contact with one another through not understanding one another, and we were apt to underestimate the interdependence of the various branches of intellectual activity. There was a natural tendency also to pay attention only to what interested us, and to regard as of little account those conclusions which did not seem so important because they did not make the same appeal to us. Men only see what they have eyes to see, and the wish is often father to the thought, even with persons of rare intellectual honesty. In the same way the masses of men at different periods are swayed by new currents of thought which they interpret according to their desires. The theory of progress, for instance, which had its origin in France before the great Revolution, when it crossed over to England, characteristically took the form of a faith in boundless industrial expansion, its litanies were trade statistics, its goal the supremacy of British commerce. In the same way Darwin's doctrine of the survival of the fittest was closely connected with the dominant social and political events of his day, and "the devil take the hindmost," which is pure Darwinism, expresses the determinism in philosophy, which, like Calvinism in religion, are naturally in favour with those who are fairly content with the world as it is, and think that, being guided by the laws of nature, progress can be left to take care of itself. Again, the English mind turned with horror from the hysterical emotionalism of the French Revolution to an arid rationalism from which the Romanticists were not strong enough to rescue her, and at the present day we see a revolt against the determinism of Darwin and the intellectualism of the nineteenth century, which is leading us again in the direction of mysticism and psychism. The root of all those modern movements known as vitalism, pragmatism, activism, voluntarism and the like is the new faith in the almost unlimited purposive power which gives us the capacity to ameliorate human conditions. Inspired by it the biologists are beginning to notice what looks like the spontaneous adaptation of human creatures to their environment, and welcoming signs of a wild exuberance in the creative forces of nature. Philosophers have awakened to fresh life and activity, some exalting the freedom of the will till it seems as if even the laws of nature are variable to human desire, some conceiving that the mind offers its pictures to the external world purely for its own convenience, and that only that can be true which is a good working hypothesis, and so on. Our generation wishes to believe certain things in regard to politics and social reform, and it has accordingly welcomed the philosophy of Bergson, who tells them exactly what they want to hear. Their delight is increased when he explains that the intellect is one, but only one line of progress, and that something which he calls instinct often provides a short road to knowledge. Thinking is hard work; what a joy it is, therefore, to know that it is only waste of time. Then, too, there are the conservative forces of orthodoxy, which were half silenced during the hey-day of naturalism. Super-naturalism and miracles can lift up their heads again under the new philosophy. Free will is once more rehabilitated, and not only this, but the primitive spiritism of the savage; ghosts once more walk abroad, the medicine man reappears as a faith-healer, and Christian Scientists and the hotel keepers at Lourdes do a roaring trade. The pride of the intellectuals has indeed received a blow.

Proceeding, Dr. Inge showed that all these modern ideas involve a dualism against which our strongest philosophical instincts revolt, a distinction between persons and things, between the reason and the will. Herbert Spencer is considered old-fashioned when he talks of the impossibility of believing that there is eternal war between the intellectual faculties and our moral obligations, and practical reason is no longer what it was for the contemporaries of Kant. Our extreme dislike of the eighteenth century and the tendency to vilify it and its works are very symptomatic. The position of physical science in the midst of this strange movement is very curious, and such philosophies as those of Professor James and Bergson might appear to be absolutely destructive of the rational universe. James can speak of a "wild universe which administers shocks even to its creator," and Bergson's theory of time introduces an incalculable element into every scientific calculation except pure mathematics. Science as a whole simply ignores it, except that vitalistic theories in biology now receive a respectful attention which they would not have received 30 years ago. The lecturer then turned to the movement known as Modernism, which he explained in some detail, showing why, in his opinion, it was not likely to have very satisfactory results owing to the fact that it, too, involved a radical dualism, postulated two Christs—one the historical Christ and the other the dying and rising non-historical Christ of the churches' worship—and tried to reconcile the love of the Roman Catholic cultus and discipline with an extremely subversive position in historical criticism.

In the midst of all this we seem to be in danger of being driven back upon illogical eclecticism or scepticism. The materialistic philosophy which we are now abandoning, which was profoundly unsatisfactory, and unable to comprehend the phenomenon of life, presented a clear-cut scheme which professed to explain everything, and we seem to have nothing to take its place. Can we get any help from the philosophical mystics at this point? Dr. Inge believed we could. They believed that a knowledge of ultimate reality was possible to man, and their whole quest was for the One in whom all contradictions are reconciled. Their faith was not only thought out but lived out, and their highest experience was a beatific vision. They were not only intellectual but deeply religious, and the intellectual love of God was no mere phrase to them. Finally, the strange uniformity of their system in widely different ages and countries seems to indicate that this type of thought is less influenced by contemporary currents of philosophy than any other. For a philosophical mystic like Plotinus reality is spiritual, and is constituted by the duality in unity of the perceiving spirit and the world which it perceives. Its Heaven is something more than the place where God dwells. It is the whole content of his mind, and entirely inseparable from it. It is not a place at all, but an order of being, the only mode of being which is fully and completely real, and this spiritual world contains every thought in the mind of God and every purpose in the will of God. It is not static or immobile, it is essentially life and activity, though we cannot allow that there is any development in the life and mind of God himself. Here life is eternal, but this eternity is not an endless series of moments slipped off at one end and not at the other. It is a mode of existence in which indestructibility is one of the attributes, and it belongs to the world of soul which is created by spirit. For although spirit is perfect in itself and needs nothing outside itself for its own fulness of life, its nature is creative, and it must produce the world after its own likeness. God is immanent in the world not in the sense that he lives his own life in and by means of the visible universe or the cosmic process, but because the universe reflects his thought and purpose.

It is not at all difficult to connect this philosophical view of the world with the Logos doctrine of Greek Christianity, which, indeed, in its latest phases owed a great deal to Plotinus. It draws no hard line across the field of existence, and those who have called it dualistic misunderstand it from top to bottom. One great advantage which it offers among others is that it recognises that what we loosely regard as the world known to science is not simply a self-existing cosmos independent of us who perceive it, nor yet a mere subjective creation of our own minds, but an unstable projection of the average psychic life, a conglomeration of forms which the soul has impressed upon matter, and which is not perfect like its prototype in the world of spirit. Its reality consists in its power to express under the form of processes in time and space the ideas and purposes of the divine mind, and is a system of harmonious values of the good, the true, and the beautiful. The soul that is isolated and impenetrable by these influences has a dangerous existence, for it can only save itself by losing itself. There is no natural limit to its expansion, for it is essentially all-embracing. In knowing its world it comes to know itself, and in knowing itself it comes to know the world; but both are wholly dependent on that great spiritual world which is the source from which it has come and the goal to which it strives to return. Further, this philosophy is not contingent on human desires, for it is a form of absolutism. Our experiences are inadequate to explain the absolute, which transcends change and time. It is the ineffable unity towards which the mind turns for the resolution of all contradictions, the ineffable goodness which is the desire of the moral nature, the ineffable beauty which satisfies the longings of the soul, and it is only apprehended by the soul in rare moments of vision. It does not affect the uniformity of nature's laws, for the regularity and order which we perceive in nature is surely what we should expect to find, if, as Plotinus says, order and limitation are divine attributes; but we cannot express the truth even about external nature in merely quantitative categories or mechanistic terms, and in the spiritual world mechanical laws do not apply. There is no fixed quantity of spiritual energy which can be decreased as it is drawn upon; indeed, the good things of the spirit are increased by being shared. Psychological facts may be as orderly as physical facts, and if not orderly they may still be determined by some higher powers, but they cannot be explained in terms of physical attraction and repulsion, weight and velocity. In conclusion, Dr. Inge gave a masterly summary of Professor Eucken's philosophy, with its central doctrine of the "new birth," and showed that it is in line with the mystical philosophy he had been describing. There would probably be as many religions in the future as there had been in the past, he said, but that this was the true line of progress in religion as well as in philosophy he had no doubt whatever. At the close of the lecture a vote of thanks to Dr. Inge was proposed by the Rev. Chas. Hargrove and seconded by Dr. John Clifford.

MRS. BESANT AT QUEEN'S HALL.

THE CHRIST-IDEA.

"THE Christ-Idea" was the subject of Mrs. Besant's lecture at Queen's Hall last Sunday evening. The idea of the divine man was, she said, perhaps the most attractive conception of the religions of the world, whether it was regarded as the ascent of man into God or the descent of God into man, and just as they had found a wonderful identity between the ideas of God held by people of different faith and nationality, so again they would find that this Christ-idea was common to almost all religions, and that it was summed up and rendered still more beautiful when it was regarded in the light of mysticism, and when it was realised that it signified the evolution of divinity in every child of man. It was that thought to which they were led as they studied the religious conceptions re-appearing millennium after millennium, until there gradually grew upon them a sense of the wonderful unity underlying all, and of the truth which at all times and in all countries has satisfied the inward yearning of men.

Two alone of the great faiths of the world, so far as she knew, said Mrs. Besant, were without this conception of the God-man as the central object of worship. It was not to be found in popular Hebrew faith, though it can be traced in the more mystical writings of the Hebrews, for owing very largely to the sense among their teachers that the people were in danger of falling away into idolatry, all image or likeness of the deity, even the human, was excluded from their conception of God. The other faith which is without this idea is Islam, and it was easy to understand, if they studied the history of the time when Islam was founded, and saw how the popular conception of God and Christ had become debased and repellent, and how this faith was established amidst brutal forms of idolatry then prevailing that the Prophet saw it was necessary to set forth the truth free from all conceptions of the human nature entering into the Godhead. If they turned to the other great faiths of the world, however, whether national or world-wide, in the centre of each this idea of the God-man shines out supreme. The human heart has ever turned to it in order that its longing for sympathy and kinship may be satisfied, and man has really followed the profoundest promptings of the spirit when, although not as yet realising his own divinity, he saw in human likeness the being of God. Everywhere, of course, there was a less exalted form of this belief than the one which they had called the Christ-idea, as in the Greek, the Roman, and the Hindu conception of the demi-gods, who were kings, warriors, statesmen, and sometimes teachers. It was a common idea that, as in the Gospel story, these heroes should have no earthly father. It was more interesting still to find that wherever they got the idea of a demi-god, they found a polytheistic religion in which the pantheism of its followers is, for the sake of worship, and for the purpose of attracting men, veiled in the form of mighty spiritual intelligences called gods. In this connection they would recall that verse in Genesis over which so much dispute had arisen, in which it is said that "the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and they took them wives of all that they chose." This idea, that there were angels who came down and wedded mortal women, we find over and over again in the literature of the ancient world, and in every faith where the supreme deity is regarded as incarnating in all forms throughout the universe life becomes permeated with the idea of the super-physical existences which in the Christian as in other faiths play a considerable part in human affairs.

Coming to the Buddhist religion the lecturer said the way in which man evolves into divinity is there beautifully and clearly shown. We have first the fundamental idea of reincarnation, and so, when the Lord Buddha has reached the final point of illumination, we read how he looks backward over the uncounted æons of the past, and sees the spirit that is within him climbing up the great ladder of existence from the earliest beginnings in the mineral. Through birth after birth and death after death it passes until the time comes when it is said to take the vow to be a saviour of the world, and then, it is written, he perfects the vow age after age until he comes at last to his final mortal birth. The idea of the evolution of a Buddha has as its starting point a man moved by an impulse of profound compassion for the sorrows of the world, and taking his first step on the path which leads to the wisdom of the Bodhisattva, the shaping of new civilisations, and the founding of new religions.

Proceeding, Mrs. Besant gave an explanation of the Hindu conceptions, in which the supreme manifestation of God is more closely allied to the Christian idea, for there the avatara descends from God into manhood, but does not climb from manhood into God. From time to time from the second person of the Hindu Trinity there comes forth a fragment of God Himself, who descends into the world of man, and becomes in that world a saviour and a teacher. Ten of these avataras (avatara means descent) are spoken of in the Hindu scriptures. Nine are of the past. One more is to come, it is believed, in some hundreds and thousands of years from the present time. There is one peculiarity of the Hindu faith, the oldest of all living faiths, in regard to these avataras; they mark out the great epochs of evolution as recognised by science, which by symbol they prefigured. The first avatara is in the form of a fish, the second in the form of a tortoise, and so on until the human type is reached, and if this is put side by side with evolution, as seen by science, it will be noticed that the first is the symbol of the time when water covered the earth, the second of the reptilian period, and so on, until you reach the full-grown man. Then come the great human types whose names dominate Hinduism—Rama, the perfect king, and Krishna, the perfect object of devotion. In these two divine figures all that we can think of most splendid in power, most magnificent in justice, and greatest in rulership is embodied in Rama; all that we can think of as tenderest in human love, fairest in childhood, joyous and glad, with the flute ever playing divine music to which the very beasts of the field are attracted, is enshrined in Shri-Krishna—the gracious God of the home and of the child who dwells in the heart of every woman in India who follows the Hindu faith. The ninth avatara is the Lord Buddha, accepted, however, as a descent from God and not an ascent from man, intended for the nations outside India. The tenth is yet to come, as has already been said. In Egypt the same idea is embodied as Osiris, among the Persians as Mithra, and in many other nations similar divine men appear, the story of whose lives is very similar, and all are closely connected with the story of the sun's course through the year. Lastly, we find the same conception forming the central thought of Christianity, and, as in Hinduism, the being to whom the heart of the Christian goes out is the second person in the Trinity.

What I want you to realise if you can and will, continued Mrs. Besant, is that what that idea is in inspiration and beauty to you, so is the idea of the Buddha to the Buddhists, of Rama and Krishna to the Hindu. To the Egyptians, Osiris represented the same thought of God and man united, and it should not be forgotten that the Egyptian dead was said to become Osiris just as the Christian thinks of his beloved dead as being united to Christ. These great ideas are human, they are not the appanage of any special faith. They reappear in every religion, and so testify to one truth which underlies them all. Those who have gone deeply into this matter regard the great being who in the West is spoken of as the Christ, as the Supreme Teacher of all the religions of the world; in other words, they believe that in every religion the same person is loved and worshipped, although many people of the various faiths would feel offended at the idea. He is much nearer to each one of us than we dream, and his worshippers everywhere are united in their prayers no matter by what name they call themselves. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold," he has said; "them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and they shall be one flock, one shepherd." There is one Shepherd in the highest world, and he shall draw all men to him, for they know his voice and will learn to know each other.

In a very impressive passage Mrs. Besant proceeded to recapitulate the events of the life of Christ as recorded in the New Testament, interpreting them in the light of the esoteric doctrine of initiation, and concluded by saying that this story is the mystical story of the unfolding of God in the human spirit, and that every Christ is only a prophecy of the man of the future, who, endowed with powers which lie hidden in us all, shall ultimately be master of the physical as well as the super-physical. "To live the Christ-life while still in the body of the flesh is the true reality of mystical Christianity; not to be saved by a Christ without you, but to be uplifted by the Christ within you; to become the very Christ yourself in your love for the out-cast, the helpless and despairing, and to know that every pain you have suffered in your human pilgrimage is transformed into the power to help the fainting children of men, and raise them a little nearer to the life that is divine. You think too little of yourselves to claim your birth-right, and hold it a heresy to believe what your own scriptures proclaim—that Christ is the first-born among many brethren; but the greatest heresy is the heresy of the life, not of the brain, calling itself a 'miserable sinner' when it ought to be climbing into the sonship of God. I would pray you to rise to your great calling, and to realise that names and creeds make no difference. Take the one that helps you most; and the Christ of all faiths will recognise those as brothers in whom his own life shines out most perfectly."

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE Anniversary Meetings in connection with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have been held in London this week. There has been a large attendance of ministers and delegates from the country. The summer weather has given a touch of beauty to the pleasures of human fellowship, and the presence of the Dean of St. Paul's to deliver the Essex Hall Lecture added a note of breadth and distinction to the proceedings. As he genially reminded his hearers in his speech at the President's luncheon, denominational barriers neither go down to the bottom nor up to the top. On Wednesday evening a group of ministers still in the first ardour of youth had a fine innings, and proved that the new generation has gifts of thought and eloquence of its own. The arrangements made for the comfort of their guests by the Rev. W. C. Bowie and his able helpers were as complete as usual. But once again Essex Hall, with its old-fashioned staircase, proved itself quite inadequate for a big occasion. Now that the Sustentation Fund has reaped the full reward of its pleasant importunity, Essex Hall should be tackled as the next big task. A beautiful and well-ventilated hall in which it is easy to hear, commodious offices, and a suite of rooms which can be kept for club and other social purposes, these should be the minimum demand.

THE SERVICE.

The Annual Service was held on Tuesday evening at Unity Church, Islington. There was a large congregation which filled the building. The service was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., of Newcastle-on-Tyne. His sermon on "The Rending of the Veil" will appear in our issue next week.

THE PRESIDENT'S LUNCHEON.

A large number of delegates and friends were entertained at the close of the Essex Hall Lecture to luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant by Mr. G. H. Leigh. After the usual loyal toast the President submitted the sentiment "Our Guests from Other Lands," to which Professor E. de Faye, of Paris, Miss Mary Richmond (New Zealand), Sir Krishna Gupta, representing the Brahma Samaj, and Dr. J. H. Crooker, U.S.A., made short speeches in reply. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter submitted the sentiment "The Church Universal," to which the Dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Clifford and Dr. J. Drummond responded. In the course of his speech Dr. Inge remarked that denominational barriers neither go down to the bottom nor up to the top. In the sphere of devotion it was not necessary to talk of the re-union of Christendom, for there Christendom had never been divided. He felt that it was their duty to try to break down barriers that were clearly artificial and unreal, and traditional denominational barriers were generally of that kind.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

At the public meeting on Wednesday evening there was again a very large attendance. Mr. G. H. Leigh presided, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. R. Nicol Cross on "Tradition and Inspiration," the Rev. J. Cyril Flower on "The Foundation of Truth," the Rev. Lawrence Clare on "Human Needs Today," and the Rev. E. Stanley Russell on "The Gospel of a Free Faith." These addresses will appear as a consecutive series of articles in our columns, beginning next week. The annual business meeting was held on Thursday morning, too late for a report to appear in our present issue.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION. ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

THE Sunday School Association held its eightieth anniversary meetings at Essex Hall on Tuesday, June 2. The proceedings began in the morning with a conference of delegates from district Sunday-school societies and schools, Mr. Ion Pritchard, the President, in the chair. Mr. Pritchard, in giving a warm welcome to the delegates, said that it was really only by such meetings that the committee could get into touch with those who were working in other parts of the country, and they were very anxious, therefore, to get the question of correspondents in the schools taken up so that they might learn more about their friends at a distance. They were about to discuss "Sunday School Institutions." That introduced the problem which is always cropping up at Sunday-school conferences—how were they going to keep the elder scholars? The only way seemed to be by some society or institution outside the Sunday school, where the teacher and scholars might have opportunities of meeting together in some sort of social gathering, and becoming comrades and friends. There were many of these institutions now in existence, and it would be helpful if those who had any experience of them would tell those present what they were doing along this particular line. An interesting and practical discussion followed in which the Rev. Fisher Short, Miss Green, the Revs. A. H. Biggs, R. F. Rattray, W. Shanks, and others took part. Subsequently the delegates lunched together at the Holborn Restaurant. In the course of a few words of welcome Mr. Pritchard referred in feeling terms to the absence of the Rev. J. J. Wright, who was still too unwell to be present after his long illness. The welcome from the chair was responded to by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association.

MR. FRANK ROSCOE'S ADDRESS.

Mr. Ion Pritchard again presided when the delegates and friends reassembled after luncheon for the afternoon meeting. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie opened the proceedings by moving the following resolution:—"That this meeting of representatives of Unitarian and Free Christian churches and Sunday schools conveys its deepest sympathy to the relatives and friends of the men, women, and children who lost their lives so suddenly by the sinking of the Empress of Ireland. The appalling loss of life has darkened many homes on both sides of the Atlantic at this Whitsuntide. Our own religious community has suffered in the death of Mr. A. G. Maginnis, son of a minister, a member of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of the Laymen's Club, and the Wandsworth congregation. To the Salvation Army, some of whose forthcoming international meetings are to be held in this hall, this meeting would express its sincere sympathy in the loss of so many brave and earnest religious workers." The resolution was passed, all standing.

After a few introductory remarks from the chairman, Mr. Frank Roscoe (late lecturer on Education and Head of the Training College for Men in the University of Birmingham) delivered an address on "Method in Sunday School Teaching." The term method, he said, was really one which had a peculiar technical meaning in English education, which it derived from the days when training colleges for elementary teachers were first established not for general training in the art of teaching, but for emphasising a definite and particular method associated with some particular man. But there was no such thing as a universal or general method, whether in Sunday schools or elsewhere. A method must always emerge from the threefold relation between the subject matter, the teacher, and the pupil. It was as dangerous to give wholesale teaching devices as it would be to compel all teachers to wear the same pattern of boots. There were certain features common to all teaching, of course, but circumstances had to be taken into consideration which altered the character of the teaching. The two things to be chiefly studied in Sunday-school work were the subject taught and the person to be taught. Amiable zeal was not a complete equipment for the Sunday-school teacher. The subject, first of all, must be known by the teacher, a point which had been sadly lacking in observance in the past.

The old-fashioned methodless teaching has now been made impossible by the day-school, which is tending more and more to keep children interested, and to teach them in a manner which arrests their minds. They must follow this example in the Sunday school; it was a challenge to the teachers to make themselves more efficient in the technique of their calling. At the same time, the methods of a day-school cannot be transferred bodily to the Sunday school, where, for instance, the rigour of discipline would be out of place. But along with the knowledge of the subject the teacher must have a knowledge of the pupil. That special knowledge was known by the word psychology, a word which there were none to explain and very few to spell. It was better to think of this as sympathy—not the sympathy with the child as a bundle of original sin which made people solicitous to beat the bad out of him, as in former times, nor yet the sympathy of these days which regarded the child as an angel, with wings imperfectly hidden beneath a tunic of art fabric. Real sympathy depends on knowledge of the child and his ways, and the patient effort to enter into the workings of his mind. Given these two things, a knowledge of his subject and this entire sympathy with the mind of the child, the teacher's method would grow, and become part of himself. That was called personality, and personality was nine-tenths of a teacher's equipment. It was said that teachers required a great deal of encouragement. The true teacher did not, for he regarded his task as the most delightful, interesting, and amusing of occupations.

BUSINESS MEETING.

At the close of Mr. Roscoe's address the business meeting was held. The financial statement was presented by Mr. W. Blake Odgers, jun., hon. treasurer, who drew attention to the fact that the Association still spent about £100 more than it received, though they had received legacies which enabled them to meet their difficulties. The committee's report, submitted by Mr. T. M. Chalmers, hon. secretary, was taken as read. Last year, he said, the keynote of the discussion in the morning had been the need for more scientific teaching. Means might be found within the next few years of bringing to the teachers and would-be teachers throughout the country new ideas of what child study and method and knowledge meant. They had been optimists of pessimism in their Sunday-school work, and had deliberately refused to get people who needed training. They had believed that the teacher was heaven-born, and in sweeping the heavens with their net had sometimes caught a star; but it was at last realised that training was necessary to bring out the best qualities of the teacher, and they were now asking that the teacher should come to them with a reasonable amount of knowledge, sympathy, willingness and leisure, and they would help to make of him a tool that would not break in the hands of the great Artificer.

In moving the adoption of the reports Mr. Ion Pritchard said the problems facing Sunday-school workers were very pressing, but the report showed that a great deal had been done, and much interest had been aroused in the subject. The need of classes for the training of ministers in Sunday-school methods had been recognised, and they had been in communication with all the theological colleges during the year. He was glad to say that sympathetic replies had been received from each one, and that in two of them, at all events, classes are to be instituted.

The Rev. J. A. Pearson, who gave a brief account of the new Sunday School Monthly, pleaded for co-operation between the teachers, and urged that more time should be spent on Bible study. The magazine was trying to provide the teachers with the right kind of help, and the editorial board were considering new methods by which it might be rendered still more useful. Nothing could prevent people from improving personality if they had the will to do so, and it was the educated personality that was wanted in Sunday-school work. Mr. George H. Leigh, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, seconded the adoption of the report, and spoke of the long and valued services of Mr. Ion Pritchard, who had done so much for the welfare of the Sunday School Association, particularly in regard to the Summer School at Oxford, which has issued a very interesting syllabus of the lectures and conferences arranged for its meeting this year.

The next item in the afternoon's proceedings was the presentation to Mr. Pritchard by the Rev. T. P. Spedding of a handsomely bound address commemorating his twenty years of service as hon. secretary of the Association, together with a cheque for £650 which has been subscribed by supporters and friends of the Sunday-school movement, and which, by the generosity of Mr. Pritchard, will be used in promoting some special objects in connection with the work of the Association. The address is as follows:—

To ION PRITCHARD.—The Association

at its last annual meeting received with sincere regret the announcement of your retirement from the position of Honorary Secretary. The Association now wishes to place on record its high appreciation of your conspicuous and devoted services to the Sunday Schools connected with our Unitarian and Free Christian Churches during a period of nearly twenty years. Since the founding of the Association in 1833, with one exception, you have held the position of Honorary Secretary longer than any of your predecessors.

The Association recalls with admiration the care and regularity with which you discharged the duties of your voluntary office; your personal generosity and disinterestedness; the efforts you made to further the success of every department of the Association's work; your especial interest in the Summer School for Teachers at Oxford since its inauguration in 1899; and your constant desire that the Association should represent high and noble ideals of Sunday School work.

At gatherings of Sunday School Teachers and Workers in all parts of the country you have always been a welcome visitor and a valued counsellor.

You have also ably represented the Association at the Meetings of the International Congress of Religious Liberals in London, Amsterdam, Geneva, Berlin, and Paris; and at the World's Sunday School Convention at Zürich.

The Association affectionately remembers that for many years you had the advantage of the loyal and devoted assistance of your sister, the late Miss Marian Pritchard, so widely known and beloved in our Schools as "Aunt Amy."

The Association was unwilling that your retirement should pass without its commemorating in some permanent form your long tenure of office. On your retirement a year ago, and coinciding with your election as President of the Association, a Fund was opened which will be known as "The Pritchard Fund."

The Association appreciates your desire that the income of the Fund shall be used for some special objects in connection with Sunday School work; and expresses its gratitude that the observance of your wishes in this respect will permanently strengthen the resources of the Association.

Signed on behalf of the Association and the subscribers, T. P. Spedding, President 1912-13; W. Blake Odgers, Jun., Hon. Treasurer; T. M. Chalmers, Hon. Secretary.

Mr. Pritchard cordially thanked all those who had contributed to the fund and done honour, not only to himself but to the memory of his sister, and immediately handed the cheque to the treasurer, who expressed the gratitude with which the Association received so generous a gift. Mrs. Roberts moved the re-election of the officers and committee and warmly endorsed the references that had been made to Mr. Pritchard's services to the Association, which would still have the benefit of his suggestions and guidance. The Rev. A. W. Fox seconded the resolution, which was passed unanimously, and the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to Mr. Roscoe for his address moved by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, seconded by the Rev. H. R. Tavener.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN LAY PREACHERS' UNION.

THE annual meeting was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday last at 5 o'clock, the President, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., in the chair. The attendance was moderate. The report stated that a scheme of study was to be prepared and recommended to the members of the affiliated societies. The committee was of opinion that much might be done to carry our message to outlying districts, and lay preachers and others near enough to help in the Van Mission were urged to offer their services to Mr. Spedding. The distribution of literature, addressing open-air meetings, and collecting the names and addresses of those interested in the movement was work which was required and could be carried out by enthusiastic laymen. The London Lay Preachers' Union had been affiliated during the year, and both the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties and the London District Unitarian Society had gratefully acknowledged their debt to that Union. Mr. Spedding had reported that the Newcastle Lay Preachers' Union had arranged over three hundred services conducted by its members during the year. The Sheffield and District Association had supplied 101 services, while 38 others had been conducted by men who were in sympathy with the Association. The Midland Union is at present without a secretary. Having regard to the demands for lay preaching up and down the country, the committee feel strongly that there is justification for a comprehensive union of local unions and individual lay preachers, and they appeal for support, for workers and funds for carrying on with earnestness and enthusiasm a glorious and noble work.

The report was adopted; some rules were amended, and the officers and executive for the year elected. Of these, Mr. Chancellor is again the President, and Miss Francis takes the place of Mr. Penwarden, who has resigned the secretaryship.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

COMPLETION OF THE £50,000.

OUR readers will be glad to learn that the special effort to raise by Whitsuntide £50,000 in aid of the Sustentation Fund has been crowned with complete success. Next week we shall be able to advertise the Final List of donations, and also to insert a letter from the officers on behalf of the Special Committee.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Advisory Committee.—The Rev. Irvine Lister, late Congregational minister, has received from the Advisory Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire a certificate of fitness to occupy the position of a Minister in the Province.

Pontypridd.—At a meeting of the Women's League the report and balance sheet of the recent sale of work showed that £45 had been realised. The public meeting held at the Municipal Buildings under the joint auspices of the church and of the S.E.W.U. Society and addressed by Miss Councillor Margaret Ashton, of Manchester, was well attended. In the unavoidable absence of Mr. Llenfer Thomas (the Pontypridd Stipendiary Magistrate), Mr. Rhys Morgan, M.A., headmaster of the County School, took the chair. Several Councillors, as well as many prominent people interested in the proposal to establish a Municipal Hostel for Women, took part in a prolonged discussion. A hearty vote of thanks was passed to Miss Ashton.

Leeds.—An excellent portrait of the Rev. Charles Hargrove has just appeared in the Yorkshire Observer, accompanied by the following account of his life and work:—When the Rev. Charles Hargrove retired in September, 1912, from the pulpit of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, after thirty-six years, within a couple of days he was offered the title of Minister Emeritus by a congregation reluctant to part altogether from the respected pastor who had been with them so long. Mr. Hargrove accepted the offer "with eagerness and delight," in his own words. "I am not retiring to 'enjoy,' as kind friends have told me I had the right to do, 'a well-earned rest,'" he told his congregation. "I have taken a house at Harrogate, seven minutes' walk from the station. I shall have a pass into Leeds, and go on with all the work I am at present engaged in, and be always ready to help when called on as long as I keep fit. I am not going away, and I am not ceasing to be minister of Mill Hill." Mr. Hargrove is fulfilling his words, and by frequent visits and an activity that seems inexhaustible he still keeps in sympathetic touch with the affairs of the city wherein half his life has been spent, and which he claims as his own rather than London, where he was born. He came to Leeds in 1876, after two years spent as a University Extension lecturer. Before that time he had had great spiritual changes. When he left Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1862, he was a High Churchman, but after theological studies in Rome and France he was ordained a Roman Catholic priest at Avignon in 1869. It was the realisation of a desire for greater freedom that impelled him to leave the rigidity of the Roman Catholic Church for Unitarianism. While an Extension lecturer he met Mr. Charles Beard, who had friends in Leeds. Mr. Beard wrote to members of the Mill Hill congregation that Mr. Hargrove would be much happier in the situation of a minister than in that of a lecturer, and asked if Mill Hill would give him the opportunity of entering into that ministry if they found him suited to them. Mr. Hargrove was invited to preach at a week evening service, and shortly afterwards he was elected minister of Mill Hill Chapel. By his eloquent sermons and speeches during his long ministry there, and by his wide interests in all social movements, Mr. Hargrove has become known and respected far beyond the bounds of the city, or even of Yorkshire. His eminence in religious circles was recognised by his election to the position of President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for the year 1910-11, and he has served faithfully on the Manchester College Committee. In 1904 he rendered signal service to his fellow Unitarians overseas by a visit to Australasia in order "to seek to gather together stray Unitarians, and to bring a message of sympathy and good cheer from their English brethren and the churches already organised," to use his own words. That he is still chairman of the executive committee of the Leeds Charity Organisation Society shows that his interest in social work remains as keen as ever.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

AN AMERICAN NOBEL INSTITUTE.

Professor Eucken has made the interesting suggestion in the New York Independent that a foundation should be established in the United States for the encouragement of those arts and sciences for which the Nobel Institute of Stockholm makes no provision. Important and beneficent as the Nobel Institute is, he points out that it has certain limitations. The founder, himself a distinguished chemist and engineer, was naturally partial to the sciences, and five prizes are awarded yearly for physics, chemistry, medicine, for the broad field of literature, and, lastly, for the best services rendered in the cause of peace. Nevertheless, to quote Professor Eucken's words, "what we in Germany call the mental sciences, such as history, political economy, and sociology, are not recognised by Nobel's gift except in so far as they are closely related to general literature. Only a few of them, however, are so related." Professor Eucken suggests that this valuable work should be carried further in the spirit of the originator. Prizes should be provided for, say, work in theology and the science of religion, law and political economy, philology and history, while, of the natural sciences, the biological branches should receive as much attention as the others. "Finally," he adds, "besides recognition of services in behalf of peace, recognition should also be given to social and humanitarian work in a grand style for the amelioration of pain and misery. Since these provinces do not offer great prospects for material success, it is the more to be desired that the leaders in them should be given a chance to obtain complete economic independence."

THE CONSOLATIONS OF LOURDES.

An interesting article on the pilgrims of Lourdes in the Times this week closes with a passage marked by sympathetic insight which makes the comments of those who deplore the ignorance and superstition of these suffering men and women sound a little superficial. It is very certain that numbers of the faithful are not healed at all in the sense that they expected, but they do receive spiritual consolation which strengthens their hold on the eternal, and reaches down to a depth of religious consciousness which sensational "miracles" would probably leave untouched. "There was no startling cure," says the writer of this article, "such as has undoubtedly occurred at this place from time to time" no casting away of crutches; no sudden deliverance from blindness or paralysis; yet a great miracle without question was the expression on every face, the enlightening of souls which seemed to transcend all pain, a joy that was clouded by no shadow of disappointment. That, indeed, is for me, at any rate, the unforgettable experience of Lourdes. With the haunting echo of the 'Ave!' and the picture of the great torchlight processions like a fiery serpent winding among the dim trees and under lofty towers, there will ever be associated in my mind a vision of faith great enough to seek and to expect miracles, yet in the hour, as it might be, of reaction and disappointment, steadfast, abiding, unshakable."

TEMPERANCE AND THE RULERS.

Several of the leading sovereigns of the world have already made acknowledgment of the memorial petition despatched to them as a result of the recent International Prohibition Conference at Milan, and the International Prohibition Confederation has received considerable encouragement in its long-continued efforts to impress the responsible officials in Russia with the havoc which is being wrought by the vodka monopoly. A lamentable state of things is described by a writer in the Anglo-Russian, who deals with the Czar's recent rescript, which is the outcome of the fact that the State monopoly of the liquor traffic is undermining the health and efficiency of the people. As might be expected, it is the effect upon the army which is regarded with most concern by those in authority. The alcoholic poison has so widely and deeply penetrated the national organism in the literal sense of the word, has taken such a hold not only of the grown-up town and rural population, but even of school children, that of recent years the physical, moral, and mental fitness of the regular army has been affected to an alarming degree, and repeated cries have been raised in the Russian Press that if the consumption of alcohol continues unabated, the military defences of the Empire might as well be discarded altogether. Hence the Czar's salutary conviction that "the prosperity of the State Treasury must not remain dependent on the moral and economic ruin of the multitudes of my faithful subjects." Yet it has taken eighteen years to find this out!

MR. F. H. BRADLEY AND THE ARGUMENT FOR IMMORTALITY.

The following interesting passage is taken from "Essays on Truth and Reality," a new book by Mr. F. H. Bradley recently published by the Oxford University Press. "From a religious point of view the value of the arguments for what is called immortality, at least to my mind, seems limited. What appeals to me, if I may be allowed to repeat it, is the demand of personal affection, the wish that, where a few creatures love one another, nothing whether before or after death should be changed. But how can I insist that such a demand (whatever one may dare to fondly hope or dream) is endorsed by religion? And the rest of the arguments leave me not merely unconvinced but cold. On the other side I readily admit a difference, and, if you please, a defect in my temperament, and a difference also, and, if you like to say so, a weakness in my imaginative power. And wherever after due consideration it is found by any man or any set of men that religion calls for a genuine individual personal existence after death, I am on the side of such a doctrine. I think that the belief, so far, is right, and, under this condition, may be called true. Exactly what its truth comes to in the end, however, I think that we cannot know, and, so far as we are religious, I am sure that we ought not much to care. And I must insist that the above demand is to be made really in the interest of religion, and not, as far more often happens, in the interest really of something quite different. . . . Humanity has progressed, so far as it has progressed, not by the ideas and arts of the medicine man, but by life and work in the daylight. And to seek for truth and satisfaction elsewhere I take to be the essence of superstition."

INDIA'S PLEA FOR JUSTICE.

On Thursday evening, June 11, Mrs. Besant will speak on "India's Plea for Justice," at Queen's Hall, at a public meeting over which Lord Brassey will preside. The recent case of the Indians in South Africa and the present case of the Hindus at Vancouver will serve to emphasize the urgency of an acute Imperial problem which Mrs. Besant has already dealt with in the columns of the Times. She takes the view that only by securing the sympathetic co-operation of India and treating that country as an integral part of the Empire on the same footing as the Colonies can the problem be solved. A large part of the Queen's Hall is reserved for free admission, and free seats will be given to the limit of accommodation available.

PROBLEM No. 60.

By HERREN POSPISIL AND KOTRC.

BLACK. (6 men.)

WHITE. (6 men.)

White to play and mate in two moves.

SOLUTION OF No. 58.

1. Kt. Q7 (key-move).

SOLUTION OF No. 58A.

1. Q. R6 (key-move).

Correct solutions of both problems have been received from W. E. Arkell, G. Pegler, E. C. (Highbury), Rev. B. C. Constable, F. S. M. (Mayfield), and W. T. M. (Sunderland).

Correct solutions of No. 58 only from R. B. D. (Edinburgh), and of No. 58A only from Rev. I. Wrigley and E. Wright.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

H. T. COOPER and others.—The key-move to No. 56 should read 1. Q. Kt6, and not K. Kt6.

To several Correspondents.—Kindly give No. 58 a little more study; it is a fine problem, and defences to the various attempts which have been made can be found. The move 1. Kt. Q7 is the only correct method.

Our No. 60, composed in collaboration by two Bohemian masters, contains some beautiful mates. Two of these are surprisingly similar, though inflicted first with the QB and then with the KB. This is the central idea, and is called an "echo" variation. The "echo" has to be carefully traced by the solver. This problem is a good example of the beauty of chess problems as opposed to games. This "echo" mate would not occur in ten thousand ordinary game situations; but is none the less beautiful for all that, and shows that the imaginative intellect can force such situations, for it is unhampered with any idea of conflict. It is an example of a different form of mental dexterity—a form which is, alas! ignored and misunderstood by many chess players, whose enthusiasm for chess falls unaccountably short in the direction of artificial situations.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S NEW BOOKS.

The Psychopathology of Every-day Life.

By Professor Dr. SIGMUND FREUD, LL.D. Authorized English Edition, with Introduction by A. A. BRILL, Ph.B., M.D. Cloth, 12/6 net.

In this book, Professor Freud applied the principles laid down in his great work, "The Interpretation of Dreams," to the common mental errors and mistakes of all kinds in every-day life, including the forgetting of proper names, foreign words, impressions, things said, &c., and the lapses of tongue and pen, and involuntary mistakes in bodily action. His theory, it will be remembered, is that such mistakes are due to suppressed ideas, striving, so to speak, to reinstate themselves, and interfering with the normal mental process. He illustrates his theory with a very large number of examples drawn from all departments of human life. It is unquestionably a work of great interest and indispensable to all students of psychology.

Psychology and Social Sanity.

By HUGO MÜNSTERBERG, Litt.D., LL.D., Author of "Psychology and Crime." Cloth, 5/- net.

In this volume of collected essays, the author deals, from a psychological standpoint, with a number of the most interesting questions of the day, such as Sex Education, on which he justifies the old-fashioned reticence; Socialism; Thought Transference; and with various other subjects, such as Advertising and Investing and Popular Proverbs.

RUDOLF EUCKEN'S WORKS.

Collected Essays of Rudolf Eucken.

Edited and Translated by MEYRICK BOOTH, B.Sc., Ph.D. (Jena). Author of "Rudolf Eucken: His Philosophy and Influence." Cloth, 10/6 net. [Just Published.

Main Currents of Modern Thought.

A Study of the Spiritual and Intellectual Movements of the Present Day. Translated by MEYRICK BOOTH, B.Sc., Ph.D. (Jena). Fifth Impression. Cloth, 12/6 net.

The Problem of Human Life.

As viewed by the Great Thinkers from Plato to the Present Time. Translated by W. S. HOUGH and W. R. BOYCE-GIBSON. New Edition, with a new chapter and appendices. Cloth, 10/6 net.

Rudolf Eucken: His Philosophy and Influence.

By MEYRICK BOOTH, B.Sc., Ph.D. (Jena). Cloth, 3/6 net (post free, 3/10).

"From the point of view of the plain man, he (the author) has written a deeply interesting book. Dr. Booth knows what his readers want of him. He goes straight to the root of the matter."—The Spectator.

"As a general survey of Eucken's philosophy this little treatise will do extremely well. Dr. Booth has a gift of clear and candid exposition."—The Manchester Guardian.

FIRST CHEAP EDITION.

Woman and Labour.

By OLIVE SCHREINER. Popular Edition. Cloth, 2/- net (post free, 2/4).

"It is one of those books which are sunrises, and gives us spacious and natural horizons. Like Mazzini's essays, it is logic touched with emotion, politics on fire. One may begin to doubt the cause of women's rights when the opponents of sex equality produce an equally glowing, earnest, and prophetic book."—The Daily News.

"Remarkable as this book of Olive Schreiner's is, merely as an intellectual achievement, its greatness and its life are in the emotional power which has found its inspiration in a vision of the future. . . . A book which will be read and discussed for many years to come."—The Nation.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Congress of the Salvation Army which has assembled in London this week bears striking witness to the international character of its work and the success of its spiritual appeal. People in middle life can recall the days when the first Salvationists were regarded by the public with contemptuous amusement. Now their uniform is a badge of honour. Seldom indeed has wisdom been so quickly justified of her children. The day has happily gone by when educated people were blind enough to place it all to the account of crude theology and appeals to fear. It is a fire kindled by a spark of grace. It is the passion for souls, which ignores all barriers of class and race. It has asked for obedience, discipline, complete self-dedication, and everywhere men and women have pressed forward eagerly to obey the call. The older churches, more entangled in conventionality and less spontaneous in their movements, can only look on with amazement and pay a generous tribute to the conqueror in many a field where they have failed. But there is also the possibility of gaining fresh stimulus for their own work if they follow the proceedings of this Congress of the Nations with keen intelligence and prayerful sympathy.

THE Archbishops of Canterbury and York have issued an appeal to "the religious citizenship of the country" on behalf of the Welsh Church. It repeats in dignified language the familiar argument that there must be some divorce between religion and the State unless what is known as the Established Church is preserved. "There is one privilege," they say, "which we do most deeply value. It is the privilege of giving witness to the Christian character of the State, and of offering the ministrations of religion in the church and in the home to all the people. Far from abandoning this privilege we would fain secure in its exercise the co-operation of all our fellow-Christians. We have been impressed by widespread signs of a growing recognition by citizens not in our communion of the need of the witness and service which it is the aim of a National Church to offer."

Now the two Archbishops are far too able as men of affairs not to recognise that pious sentiments of this kind are quite futile, unless they are prepared with some practical proposal for including the Nonconformist bodies within the Church of England on terms of mutual respect and toleration. But of such a scheme of comprehension they give no hint. The difficulty of the situation is this, that the Church of England has ceased to be the church of the nation. At least half of the population and much that is most characteristic in English Christianity is outside her borders. She has no monopoly in vital religion, and the Nonconformist cannot be expected to accept the Anglican as the custodian and representative of the religious citizenship of the country in any sense in which he is not. The whole tendency of the modern world is against State churches, and we are far from thinking that it is hostile to the best interests of religion that it should be so.

THE tenth National Peace Congress has been held in Liverpool this week. Lord Channing, the President, was unfortunately unable to be present. In the course of his address, which was read from the chair, he spoke strongly of the danger of rivalry in armaments, and recalled the wise words of Sir Robert Peel at a time of panic, "Be careful not to create new dangers by provocative arming." Pressing this advice home, Lord Channing said: "Let the Congress strike a blow to free this and other countries from the deadly peril of the armament trusts, who capture department experts, manipulate Jingo newspapers, and combine all over the world to swell their dividends by deliberately engineering new wars. Let us remember Lord Rosebery's wise warning in 1896, that we had aroused not unreasonable jealousy and distrust by grasping too big a share of the sunny places in this little world. Let us remember, too, how the late Lord Salisbury showed, in the policy of his treaties in 1890, how England might wisely give elbow room to other expanding nations to get into the sun too."

THE statue of Roger Bacon by Mr. Hope Pinker, which has been erected to commemorate the seventh centenary of his birth, was unveiled at Oxford on Wednesday. Roger Bacon was undoubtedly one of the most original minds of the Middle Ages. As a theologian and a distinguished ornament of the Franciscan Order he was known as "Doctor Admirabilis." But an enthusiastic pupil gave him a higher title of honour when he called him "the Master of Experiments." Endowed with boundless curiosity and the power of penetrating the secrets of the future, he maintained that it was possible to make "instruments of navigation without men to row in them." He also believed in the conquest of the air by flying machines, "if one sit in the midst of the instrument, and do turn an engine, by which the wings, being artificially composed, may beat the air after the manner of a flying bird." But still more remarkable was the range of his intellectual activities and his clear perception of the unity of knowledge. "All the sciences," he maintained, "are connected, and foster one another with mutual aid."

It is little wonder that in the thirteenth century he was reputed to be a magician, and suffered penalties of horrible severity at the hands of his ecclesiastical superiors. The crime of which he was guilty, to quote the eloquent words of Sir J. E. Sandys, was "an unflinching devotion to the cause of liberty, progress, and reform. He was punished by persons in authority for the unpardonable offence of holding opinions in advance of those of his own time; but the present generation will assuredly rejoice in the honour that is being paid to the memory of one who was a votary of learning and science, as well as a martyr in the sacred cause of Liberty." We may add that a new edition of "The Life and Work of Roger Bacon" by Dr. J. H. Bridges has just been issued by Messrs. Williams & Norgate as a memorial of the occasion.

It is perhaps because the art of criticism is so little practised in England that Mr. Watts-Dunton remained comparatively unknown. "The Coming of Love" was read eagerly by the few people who care for poetry, and the publication of "Aylwin" brought him a short period of popularity. But he was known chiefly as the wise friend of Rossetti, and the fidus Achates of Swinburne. He was, however, one of the living forces in modern English literature. For many years he reigned almost supreme as a critic, in the sense that he set the standard for others and helped those who were capable of understanding his fineness of perception in the use of right standards of judgment. He shared the fate of those who put their best work into anonymous writing or see it interred in encyclopædias, but the richness of his friendships and the keen pleasures of his own intellectual life probably robbed obscurity of its regrets.

LAST Saturday Lord Bryce inaugurated Barnett House, the Oxford memorial to Canon Barnett, which is to provide a centre for investigation and specialised social study. In the course of his address he made an earnest plea for the place of intellectual activity in face of the immense modern demand for doing things. Was it not rather dangerous, he asked, that thinking should bear such a small proportion to action? By thinking he meant scientific investigation, the handling of facts, the collection and observation of facts in a critical spirit. What they wanted to do in Barnett House was to provide people with facilities and opportunities for the scientific study of economic social and political phenomena. Study was equally necessary for good legislation and good philanthropy. Politics was an experimental science in the sense that every Act of Parliament was an experiment and had to be tested by its results, and what they wanted to do in this institution was to have someone recording all the legislative experiments and endeavouring to obtain a statement of how they were working in fact, and how really they turned out for good or evil.

FOLLOWING the example of many Christian bodies, the Jewish community in England is beginning to face the problem of the inadequate remuneration of its ministers. At a conference of Jewish ministers held in London this week the President, the Rev. A. A. Green, called attention to the fact that the remuneration of the clerical office in English Jewry was poor all round. He made the statement, he said, as one of fact and not by way of complaint, because no good minister became one by reason of the allurements of emolument. But they had a right to expect that the minister should have at least a living wage, so that he should be able to pursue his calling with freedom from care and anxiety, with the means to keep body and soul together, and with freedom from debt. The least that the minister had the right to expect was that he should be decently housed and decently clothed, that his family should be adequately fed, and that his children should be educated up to the standard of his own required culture. Those assembled there knew but too well that in a fearfully large proportion of their number that minimum was not attained, and the consequent suffering had reached a degree the continuance of which they could not contemplate with ease of conscience.

* * *

THERE was a welcome note of breadth and toleration in the address which Lord Parmoor gave to the Association of Church School Managers and Teachers last week. He expressed his belief that they could only find a solution of the question of religious instruction in public elementary schools in the spirit of toleration of the widest character. Toleration was not a plant that had always freely grown either in education or in religious matters, but he was glad to say that, looking at the progress of thought not only in this country but in France and Germany, the spirit of toleration in all religious matters was clearly spreading. There was an appreciation of the truth that if religious life was to hold its position side by side with modern ideas and modern thought, they must recognise that every man who earnestly held any religious opinion was entitled from those who differed from him to be given every consideration, and that he was as much entitled to the opinion as they were who differed from him.

* * *

THESE are excellent sentiments, but when they are crystallised into the policy of making provision for all possible varieties of sectarian teaching in the elementary schools they may easily lead us into unwise and unpractical courses. There is a growing consensus of opinion that all schools must be communal schools, that is to say, they must be free from ecclesiastical control, and the "atmosphere" must not be unduly favourable to one type of Christianity at the expense of another. Once again we are reminded that in the large secondary day-schools the difficulty hardly exists. With little or nothing of the rigid tradition of clerical control they recognise that there are large common elements, and that these common elements, so far from being unimportant, are of priceless value in the formation of character. They also have lucid moments when they remember that some of the responsibility for religious teaching rests upon the home and the Church, and that it is no part of their duty to turn out good Anglicans or good Wesleyans or good Baptists. We believe that the question in the elementary schools would solve itself in the same way, if we could banish the idea, so deeply rooted in the clerical mind, that even in the school-world ecclesiastical allegiance is of more importance than sound education.

TRADITION AND INSPIRATION.

BY THE REV. R. NICOL CROSS.

THE text on which I have been asked to write is Tradition and Inspiration. Being a lover of quiet, one who would pray that Jerusalem might have peace and felicity, I should prefer to let the sleeping dogs in my text lie—only they won't. They have wakened up and looked at each other, and the result is a crescendo of snarling and growling; and perhaps it is best to let them fight it out. Perhaps a peace which is merely a synonym for hushed-up hostility and latent disagreement is not to be devoutly wished for. Especially in the deepest things it is necessary that every sincere view should be urged for all it is worth. The truth we aim at will be achieved, not by the suppression of differences, but by their full recognition and ultimate harmony in a larger synthesis of thought and belief.

It is sometimes said that our theological quarrels are pettifogging and trivial; that the constituents of doctrine are unimportant in religion because religion itself is so important. But as matter of fact it is just because religion itself is so important that no constituent in it can be unimportant. If religion did not matter our differences would not matter, but because it matters so much we dare not agree to differ. Agreement to differ may be indifference. And so I shall try to face the issues in the current struggle between what may be indicated by the terms "Tradition" and "Inspiration."

Tradition stands for the body of beliefs, conventions, and customs handed down to us ready-made from the past, which we are called upon to accept and submit to, irrespective, really, of the exercise of our own private reason and judgment. Now such submission is something which it is immoral to ask and impossible to concede at the present time. The day of tradition has gone, because the age of criticism has arrived. And I for one accept the change as not only inevitable and necessary, but as right and good. Unless the present and the future, unless each age, has a mind and soul of its own and is allowed to have it, it is dead while it lives, and neither God nor man has any use for it. It is difficult to see, moreover, what use it can have for God. Criticism is the necessary preliminary to reconstruction, and reconstruction is an inherent principle of life and progress.

It will be found, therefore, that the authority of tradition in religion comes inevitably to mean stupidity in place of insight, and casuistry in place of conscience. Take the United Free Church of Scotland. Its standards are full of such casuistries, by which it seeks to make it possible for its ministers to reconcile modern sentiments with antiquated formulæ. And even so, square men feel they are being squashed into round holes, to their great discomfort. "The want of accord," says Professor Denney, of Glasgow, a fairly conservative and highly influential leader in the United Free Church, "between the intellectual attitude of the churches acting collectively and that of their individual members, is the cause not only of much discomfort and misunderstanding within, but of much scandal and reproach without." It is not the first time such an intolerable situation has been created, and in the past it resulted in setting up such explanatory formulæ as leave the standards of the church confused, inconsistent, and unintelligible. They are like the shorter Catechism in "Bunt Pulls the Strings," to be learned and accepted, not understood.

The position in the Anglican Church with regard to the traditional standards and creeds is essentially the same. Many of the clergy no longer profess to accept them in toto. Their position is another illustration of the fact that while a church can compel men to recite its formulæ, it can never compel them to believe them. And the sooner the church wakens up to that, the better for itself and for those whose mind and conscience it submits to the rack. You can bring a horse to the water, but you can't make it drink, even though you get it to put down its head and make a gurgling sound as though it were drinking.

Dr. Hastings Rashdall has said that the best thing we could do with the Athanasian Creed is "to drop it altogether." Dr. Sanday, in his recent reply to Bishop Gore's open letter, suggests the same procedure with the term "infallibility" in our theology. "The word 'infallibility' is one that, if I could, I should like to banish from theology altogether. I associate the use of it, as a rule, with complete insensibility to evidence. In most of the connections in which it is applied, it is a pure figment." Both Dr. Rashdall and Dr. Sanday insist that the ancient creeds cannot possibly express "with literal exactitude the mind of to-day." (Sanday.) "The most catholic-minded thinker of modern times, if he has breathed the atmosphere of modern science and modern culture, cannot really think exactly as Athanasius and Basil thought." (Rashdall.) In other words, it is recognised to be a psychological impossibility for the modern man to believe the Creeds of the Church in their pristine sense. "All things are in flux," as Heraclitus said—even the standards. There is no fixed truth that can be handed down in a world which changes.

The living soul of man antiquates everything temporal; the past is always in some degree an anachronism. "Too many theologians," says Dean Inge, "persist in looking back, when the people are looking forward. . . . The ultimate authority, which alone is infallible, is the eternal Living Truth."

Thus the once inviolate authority of the Christian tradition and the Christian church is shaken. And the ancient sanctities have lost their power over the lives and thoughts of men. Customs, too, are altered. There was a day when in Scotland, at all events, religion was regarded as so necessary that people were forced by ecclesiastical and civil penalty to attend church. Sunday was a day of worship, and nothing secular must interfere. What a change when the other Sunday morning church services were postponed an hour at some places on the Clyde that the worshippers might not miss seeing the Aqui- tania sailing down from dock! I wonder what John Knox and Samuel Rutherford said to each other when they looked down on such a business. Once church attendance was the compulsory thing, then for a long time it was the correct thing, now it is the courteous thing, or neither one thing nor another.

So the authority of tradition is gone or going. The hour brings its challenge to religion and the church. What is their only hope of again winning a supreme place in the life of the people? It lies in Inspiration—the inspiration of the Almighty in her ministers and members.

The first temptation will be to succumb to the spirit of the age and resort to popular attractions; to make religion easy, agreeable, cheap to all. The problem will take the form "How can we draw people to the Church?" And the most obvious way to-day is to entertain and amuse them. We'll go afishing with seductive, alluring, and puzzling subjects: "How to Win—a Straight Tip"; "Jehoiakim's Penknife"; "Up a Gum Tree." These are the sort of sops we'll be tempted to throw to Cerberus. Stooping to conquer.

In the face of such temptation let us refuse deliberately to injure the majesty of religion or compromise the dignity of the Church. A frothy success may only be the advertisement of an underlying failure. To superficialise is to sterilise. To cheapen is to weaken. If we can't succeed decently let us at least fail decently.

But there will be no danger of permanent failure if in place of a dead tradition we are imbued with the power of living religion through faith in a living God. The time calls for men for whom religion is a first-hand, not a second-hand, experience, who are as convinced of spiritual reality as of their own existence. Inspiration means just that passionate conviction which turns to convincing passion, which takes possession of a man, carries him captive, fills him with an overpowering emotion, which demands expression. It is God alive in man and man alive in God. That is what is wanted in pulpit and pew to-day. We must get that hold of reality which means that reality gets hold of us. Thus out of our own religious and spiritual experience we shall build up new certainties, greater compulsions, and more imperious authorities, for the human spirit to-day.

The old traditions have fallen like faded blooms or withered fruit; they have lost the magic of their subtle perfume, the charm of their erstwhile sweetness; like all natural things they have passed through their autumn into their winter. But it would be against all reason and analogy to infer that, because they have lost their potency and died, religion is dead and the spiritual universe become impotent. Things pass through their divine cycle; and just as one has seen the sere yellow leaves of a year gone by, on the hedgerows, extruded and dropped by the stirring of the new spring's buds, the life of the coming summer, so is it with these old forms and sanctities of the religious life—behind their fall is the present and future ascent of the Spirit of God in human minds and hearts, the renewal of His ancient life and rapture ever young, ever creative, everlasting, moving on, throwing off the limitations it has assumed in man's finite apprehensions, in order that man might recognise it as the unlimited, trust and believe in it as the only Eternal and Real, and seek it itself behind all its temporal manifestations; a Life, a Spirit, both old and new, neither old nor new, the deepest thing in the movement of the centuries, the abiding thing in the flux of generations.

THE GOSPEL OF A FREE FAITH.

BY THE REV. E. STANLEY RUSSELL.

MOST men are more liberal in their private faith than in the religion they publicly patronise. The advanced point of view is felt to be admirable for the man of parts, but something a little more primitive should be provided for "other people." The modern religious man is concerned to save the world with something that would never do for his own salvation; he wants to organise a more popular type of faith, suitable for the lower classes; he seeks to provide a religion for a destitute world; and the "ordinary man" for whom this beneficent work is undertaken ought to be very glad to have a fairly liberal faith ready provided for him; he ought to be glad to accept as true what accredited people think advanced enough for him; if he knew his place he would be grateful for the cheaper patterns with which his betters have kindly decorated the walls of his soul; they may not be what "We" admire, but they are very suitable for the purpose; if left to themselves "ordinary men" would think outrageously silly things and admire the hopelessly vulgar; and "We" are so anxious to save men from exercising their naturally degraded powers that we strive to effect their salvation by degrading them further, even from the exercise of their own self-dependence; we fear their taste in fashion, and very properly array them in the quiet livery of a righteousness which we deem becoming to the lower orders of intellect.

A good many of us would be free to confess enough sympathy with this salvatorial poor law to give us an insight into the frame of mind in which it originates; but all of us will have sufficient feeling for the salvatorially pauperised to protest that a belief which is imposed, whether by the compact authority of a religious body, or by education, or by family affection, if it be imposed, is degrading to manhood even though it chance to be a safeguard against a perilous use of freedom. To grant freedom with a possible perdition, or to demand security with probable stagnation, has ever been the alternative before the directors of religious organisation; and the choice is made in accordance with the nature of a man's faith. If he believes that the divine elements of life appeal only to men who have arrived at an advanced stage of spiritual development, and that it is impossible for the worse things of the good man to embody the saving attractions of God's goodness for the worse man—then he will insist on security; he will refuse the "bad man" freedom to worship the best he knows because that best is not up to the standard of the best of the church secretary; he will insist that every one who would worship must worship a goodness which, to many a would-be worshipper, is affectation and puerility to praise. These men who are against freedom in thought mean to be the real champions of "Truth"; they set right conclusions before all things; and, naturally enough, they take their own conclusions as a canon.

The man of a free faith, however, considers that the all important thing is for each man to think, despite the odds in favour of his conclusions being wrong; we are not so immediately concerned to conclude thought rightly as to conduct it rightly and sincerely; the conclusion of a thing is its death; and our concern in this, as in other matters, is to learn the conduct of life rather than the deportment of death. The exercise of such faculties as go to make a man is the life of a man; and to live is the highest privilege of being; it were better to hang oneself as the result of a sincere investigation into the meaning of life than to live in the life-long sloth of a sleepy mind to the age of one hundred and twenty. The end of the first is the end of a man, the end of the second is but the turning of a sod. It is the process of living that makes a man a man; in youth we are but the beginning of the thing we may be, and only the strenuous use of the being that we are can develop out of us the creature we may aspire towards becoming. It is out of our blind Truthfulness that we must grow the Truth; out of such fiery passions as we have that we must grow the purity we seek, out of the better part of our manhood we must grow divinity. We are truthful, not because we want to know the truth; on the contrary, we believe in Truth because we find the elements of truthfulness in the human mind; we strive to master passion not because we want to be pure; we love the idea of purity because we discover our elemental desire to master passion; we do not seek the divine because we believe in God; we believe in God because the whole trend of nature is to seek the divine. We believe in perfection because of the nature of our imperfections; all we are is subject to the call of mighty possibilities, which summon body, mind and heart to nobler prowess, clearer understanding and more comprehensive love. It is Strength, Truthfulness and Love we worship because we are strong enough to desire strength, truthful enough to desire intellectual rectitude, and loving enough to desire a wider scope for love. We have seen God in visions through meditation on the nobler qualities of man, and we conceive that in the employment of those nobler qualities we exercise the very faculties of God. We love these faculties not because they are divine; the word "divine" simply signifies that they are the natural "desire of all nations." They are divine because we love them. It is not of importance or concern to man that God is strong, or true, or loving; what concerns us is that in the human heart Strength, Truthfulness, and Love are enshrined as divine. We worship not the fruits of strength, truthfulness and love, but we worship those divine qualities themselves as they are actually found characterising the very processes of life. In a word, we recognise that no man comes to God save through the divinity incarnate; it is by allegiance to the ill-developed qualities of God within us that we can come to the grateful appropriation of the well-developed qualities of God without. Thus the law of our own minds must control our thought; we must think in accordance with truthfulness rather than in accordance with "Truth." To think wrongly about God is better than to accept without thought a mere conclusion concerning Him, for it is the very essence of the God we do actually worship, that His nature is communicable to us only in the processes of living; in thinking truthfully the divine quality becomes the very quality of our own being; and what matter if we go a little out of our way to take a walk in the very presence of God; we shall rest more at ease in the wayside inn of our wrong conclusion after the walk, than we could hope to rest at the great hostel to which the public automobile could have been trusted to take us.

Thought, however, is not the whole of faith. A religious faith dominates all the activities of the being; it has a core of understanding and a core of emotion; it is twin-hearted; and a free faith implies more than a free belief. It implies a free belief which carries with it a freedom of heart; as the mind is released to exercise itself in the very thoughts that are native to it, despite the dangers of a wrong conclusion, so the heart must be liberated to love the things it finds lovable, and to adore the very things which in their ineffable beauty do actually draw out the soul in praise as the sun calls the blossom to a summer bough. But here we hesitate; we have run the risk of freedom of thought until we are a Cave of Adullam for the curious-minded; we have paid the price in producing a large percentage of minds which mistake their freedom-to-think for a freedom-from-thought; we run these risks because we believe that in the act of honest thought a man develops within him the nature and presence of God. But when we come to face the freedom of feeling we draw back; if men are not compelled to feel "rightly" we must expect a social chaos! Orthodoxy we scout, but orthopathy—God forbid but that we should be persons of very right feeling!

Has a man the right to submit himself to the real, honest, sincere desires of his heart, to sort them, weigh them, and develop them, seeking among them the thing he most deeply loves, praising the thing he most sincerely admires, and refusing, if needs be, allegiance to the things it is "right" to love and admire? Is it not a suggestion of sin to suggest such freedom? Surely that is the question which has been asked and answered so often with regard to freedom of mind; it is the old alternative—sincerity or propriety. We must worship the thing that calls for our worship; and such a worship would scarcely take the form of the dull drawl in which we are accustomed to praise "Almighty God." We must love the divine which shines into our eyes and calls out the irresistible passion of our own love in return. Such a love will not forget communion, even if it has no hour appointed for the purpose. We must own up how much we love that virility and strength which in the stupid profanity of our day we call the "Devil"; we must cease from the forced effort to constrain our hearts to praise the dull idol of "right" feeling and "right" thought (whom we still affect to worship in some hymns), and trust our minds and hearts to lead us through to the very God they only can discover. Freedom cannot be inherited, it is proper to the brave; no man dare make us afraid, and that is our inheritance; but liberty is his alone who will dare to be free—who will dare to discover and obey, in the depths of his own desires and aspirations, the inward writing of that holy law of which the heart and mind of God consist.

With what a passionate joy does the first vision of a free faith baptize a man! How great a change it works in life when religion means the honest development of those qualities of heart and mind which have enabled us to "divine" divinity; when we find ourselves free to adore the thing we naturally do adore, to cultivate pity for the pitiful and ridicule for the ridiculous, love for the lovable, praise for things that stir us up to praise! What a piece of news it will be for the world when we are able, out of freedom, to declare that the virile "Devil" we admire has gone into partnership with the God who lacked virility, that "Deadly Virtue" has been dethroned together with her consort, "Deadly Vice," and that the straight-ahead living of the life we honestly desire to live is the way to hold communion with that divine Being of whom we have the only revelation we can have in the sincere and secret purposes of our own souls. We trust the mind to think; let us also trust the heart. Goodness is as unsearchable a thing as Truth; but in sincerity we are experiencing the living heart and mind of God. The highways of God have ever run through wildernesses, and the Great Highway from bestiality to divinity runs through the desert of our superstitions, lusts, thoughts, and aspirations, on through the nature of man into the nature of God.

RELIGION AND THE SUPERNORMAL.

SIR,—May I reply to one or two of the criticisms contained in the two letters which have appeared in the INQUIRER about my articles on "Religion and the Supernormal"? I hardly expected that my view of spiritualism would commend itself to ardent spiritualists, but I am sorry that Mr. Rix should think my "assumptions are not fair." May I point out that when I spoke, in my general introductory remarks, of harnessing psychic forces to serve our petty, utilitarian ends, I was not referring specially to spiritualism, but was thinking rather of our modern tendency in the use of mental and clairvoyant power. Of this, I believe the phrase used to be a true description. The spiritualist movement has quite possibly stemmed the tide of secularism, and unsettled narrow orthodoxy, but my whole contention is that it does not substitute anything worthy the name of religion. Certainly it is "a legitimate field of inquiry for all truth-seekers," but I, personally, question whether it can be considered as "a religion of a high order." The mere fact that, in the nature of things, spiritualism demands both leisure and culture of its devotees, thus excluding the masses of wayfaring men who are fools, would seem to stultify this claim.

As regards the letter on spiritual healing, I am greatly indebted to the writer for her interesting remarks. I do not make any fundamental distinction between the terms "spiritual" and "mental" healing. The results obtained from both are identical, and are due to the action of one and the same force—the force of suggestion. Only the ideas suggested are different. In any case, to make any such distinction was immaterial to my purpose, which was to point out the danger of the present tendency to make these powers into special cults. (By the way, I never used the term "pain-shunning cults." I said that, in these "pain-shunning days," healing cults were popular.) Cults of spiritual healing seem to me in no way less a perversion of intrinsically valuable and beneficent gifts than cults of mental healing. Indeed because religious ideas are suggested, they are more dangerous to religion, and lay themselves open to Dr. Inge's recent gibe that "the medicine man is reappearing as a faith healer and making a good income. Christian Science churches and hotels at Lourdes do a roaring trade. Priests are overjoyed at the unexpected boom in their earliest line of business." Christ and his disciples never isolated their gifts. Indeed, the general tendency to do so on the part of the curious crowd, who cared not for the Life revealed, but only for the material benefits gained, was a constant source of regret and disappointment to the Master. That the control of mind over matter is subservient to other elements in Christianity must be acknowledged: by all who believe that, though "it takes a soul to move a body," the primary business of religion is not with the bodily, but with the spiritual life. So long as religion is occupied in "blasting rock" (which is often her initial task), the "explosive force" contained in the control of mind (or spirit!) over matter must remain her best instrument. "Our friend the pickaxe" is not in it at all. But directly she starts upon the work for which she really exists, that of building a fair and beautiful bridge from the human to the divine, mere destructive tools become subservient to constructive ones, to a hundred wonderful and delicate implements which at last raise a structure by which it becomes possible to enter into "life upon the spiritual plane."

As to your correspondent's remark on physical pain, it seems to me that as long as we are in the body it is bound to exist. It is too inextricably bound up with the natural facts of birth and death, for instance, ever to be entirely supplanted by spiritual suffering, as it certainly was not supplanted in the life of Christ (the alternative reading of the Hebrew word translated "grief" in Isaiah liii. is "sickness.") At the same time, I do not question that mental suffering is infinitely more difficult to bear, and leads us, perhaps, nearer to Calvary. But the two cannot be separated. The very fact of the control of mind over matter means that so long as we have bodies mental suffering must react upon them, and produce physical suffering. Where there is most love there is most suffering—of both kinds. Thus they were mingled in the life of Christ, who submitted to hunger and thirst and weariness and nervous exhaustion for the love he bore mankind, before he entered upon the combined physical and spiritual torture of Calvary.

In conclusion, I regret if my article conveyed the impression that I was wholly out of sympathy with the modern revival of healing powers. On the contrary, I regard it as a most hopeful sign of re-awakening faith. Only the movement needs to be guided on right lines, lest we become as men who linger in the pleasant backwater of some mighty river, rejoicing in the fruitfulness and verdure which its passage leaves, instead of committing ourselves to its broad bosom, and seeking, with it, the infinite sea.—Yours, &c.,

THE HUMAN AND THE DIVINE.

SIR,—It will probably please V. D. Davis if I confess, in answer to his letter on "The right use of words," to having said exactly what I am reported to have said, and I am quite prepared, after having read his or her letter, to say it again—with added emphasis; for it as adequately represents my convictions and personal acceptances as anything I ever said. I don't blame him for protesting if he doesn't feel as I do. He should. That's the way we get to truth—by adjuration and protest. The statement I made is true for me, and hence can hardly be mischievous. It's well that V. D. Davis puts in "it seems to me."

But now, is it true that we feel ourselves to be separate isolated personal items?—for that's what V. D. Davis' contention comes to. He says, "Our life, with all its mystery, is not of ourselves"—then, "We know we are not the Absolute." Well, how do you get this "mystery not ourselves," and not be the Absolute? For the mystery not ourselves is still "our life." "God is the deepest reality of our life," he says again. Precisely! Then why deny it? Why not take the great truth for all it is worth? What is the difference between saying "I am God" and "God is the deepest reality of our life," or "It is the strength of the Eternal that quickens us in our obedience"? I think my phrase has the merit of brevity, but it means the same thing. Again, "If we know anything we know that we are not the Absolute." And how do we know that? Must we not know (1) ourselves, (2) The Absolute, and then judge between the two? But is there anything outside the Absolute?—because, if so, then it seems to me (useful phrase!) the Absolute is not absolute. I'm afraid I do not know I am not the Absolute. I do know—or apprehend, or realise, or accept, or "get"—that my apparent individuation leads down from the point of isolation in expression into that in which all its value is amalgamated with all else, not lost but saved in that amalgam—and that amalgam is my reality in whom I live and move and have my being.

I am not a believer in absorption—I don't believe we were ever separated to be absorbed. I do not speak of "sparks of the Divine" any more than I speak of "bits of Deity" or, for the matter of that, "pounds of God." It's all the vulgar product of this materialistic method of parcelling God out, distributing the Infinite—and I am sorry to say I don't think Professor Hy. Jones does go any higher. His article, which I remember reading, puts me in one place, and God in another; and somehow I, whom he made, am not He. There is space or lapse between us; I can lose him or find him, and so on. No! It doesn't help me. It's too far off, too cold. I want a God whom I never lose. I must be God—for that's the only guarantee of any God at all for me.—Yours, &c.,

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

SPECIAL APPEAL FOR £50,000.

SIR,—On behalf of the Special Committee for the above object, we have the utmost gratification in reporting that the appeal has met with a splendid success. The total promises amount to £50,938. From this we have had to write off £500 in consequence of lamented deaths. In addition £109 have been secured in new and increased annual subscriptions.

No further appeal will, of course, be made. But we have reason to believe that some friends, who have not yet contributed, desire to be associated with this memorable enterprise. If so, we shall be delighted to hear from them as soon as possible. In a short time we hope to send to each contributor a complete list of Donors with a statement of accounts. The Committee has already decided to hand over to the Treasurer of the Sustentation Fund £43,500, and we shall continue to transfer further sums as they come in. Donors are requested to pay their instalments to our Treasurer, Mr. Monks.

It has indeed been a real joy to us to be the channel of such splendid beneficence for an object of such vital importance to our Churches. It has been an immense encouragement to find our laity so devoted in their loyalty to our Church life, and so true in their attachment to our Ministry. The ministers themselves appreciate this most keenly, and many of them will go on their way rejoicing, able to do better work through knowing that a less inadequate, and, what is of perhaps greater importance, a less precarious provision is made for efficient and faithful service. On their behalf, as well as on that of the Committee, we desire to record a gratitude deeply felt.

One further word must be added in recognition of the splendid spirit manifested in the union of all our people in laying this gift on the altar of our church life. Of happiest omen has been the close alliance between the National Conference and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. They have marched together under a single banner. Hence the triumph of the common cause. Te Deum laudamus. Si sic semper!

HELP FOR THE BLIND.

SIR,—I have listened with interest not unmixed with indignation to the letter which appeared in your issue of May 21, with reference to Mr. Pearson's effort to cheapen Braille literature. Sentiments similar to those embodied in this letter come to one's ears from time to time, though perhaps they do not often appear in the public press, and as a blind person I should like to contradict them. It is not true that the majority of blind people are not fond of reading. When such a statement as that is made it suggests that our intellects are inferior to those of our sighted brothers and sisters, which is another fallacy. Of course, there are dull blind people as well as dull sighted people, but is Mr. Pearson's scheme to be dubbed "crazy" because a few will receive no benefit from it? As a general rule reading is the greatest pleasure a blind person has. But books do not merely give pleasure. From them we learn, without them we are in gross ignorance. Few blind people are wealthy enough to pay a reader, and, up to the present time, the amount of Braille literature has been wholly inadequate for the needs of the blind. This hampers education, cripples our outlook in life, and makes us incompetent to take our place as ably as we ought to do among our sighted friends. The scheme which Mr. Pearson is organising is a daring one. It is unique in character, its great object being to give us the same chance of reading good literature which sighted people enjoy. I wish the head of the institution whom Mr. Buckland mentions would gather his men together and tell them that Braille books were to be had as cheaply as printed ones, and if he could make them fully understand that such a thing was possible I think the result would be different from what he expects, unless the people are already prejudiced against the scheme. I am fully aware that books are not the only requirements of the blind, but they are a great necessity, and Mr. Pearson deserves the hearty thanks of all blind people for the gallant way in which he has come forward and brought our case before the public. I should like to add that he has able men to help him, and not "broken-down curates and briefless barristers." Anyone who has ever heard the Blind Chaplain of the National Institute preach will agree that he is a very eloquent speaker, and shows no signs of feebleness.—Yours, &c.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE ANGEL IN THE MARBLE.

I ONCE read a story of a sculptor who was out walking with a friend. On their way they came to a quarry whence men were digging blocks of marble. There was one block of a very curious shape, and the sculptor stopped to examine it, and then he bought it and ordered it to be sent to his studio. His friend thought him foolish to buy a piece so irregular and rough and cornery. Months passed, and he received a message asking him to come to the sculptor's work-room. There he found a most beautiful angel cut from shining white marble. Then the sculptor told him it had been cut from the block he had despised. "You only saw the ugly-shaped block that day," said the sculptor, "but I saw the angel in the marble." There is a tale, too, something like this of Michael Angelo, the Italian sculptor, perhaps the greatest sculptor who ever lived. He was once ordered to carve a statue from a block which someone else had hacked all out of shape. He did not stop to grumble about the awkwardness, but set to work with chisel and mallet and made a statue of David after he had killed Goliath the giant, a statue so perfect that for four hundred years it has been wondered at and admired by all who have seen it, and is still one of the great treasures of Italy.

This is very much like the story of poor Michael Angelo's own life. Others did the most they could to spoil it, but he never gave in. People engaged him to do work for them, but when he was half-way through it altered their minds and would not have him finish, nor even pay him for what he had done. The Pope set him to superintend the quarrying of marble at Carrara, work which another man could have done quite well, while Michael Angelo longed to be at his sculpture. His lazy father and quarrelsome brothers were always begging from him. Many of his finest works were injured or destroyed in the frequent fighting of the time. Yet through it all he worked steadily on, doing his best always. When he was starting his beloved sculpture again the Pope ordered him to leave it and to paint the roof of the Sistine Chapel. Michael begged to be excused, saying that painting was not his trade, and that Raphael would do it better. The Pope insisted, and again Michael Angelo did his best. Some of the letters he wrote may still be read, and they show how much trouble he had at this time. He was cheated and annoyed by those who professed to help him. The Pope gave him no money, he was often ill. Yet he persevered, and in four and a half years the great roof was covered with magnificent paintings. So all through his long life he refused to let trouble or sickness spoil his life and his work. He was always making a statue out of the spoilt marble.

Are not these stories good for us? We may think of our lives as blocks of marble which we may shape into beautiful forms. There is an angel in every one of us, only we must take care to let the angel grow, and not let the wild beast part of us become the master. For, after all, I expect angels are just perfect men and women and children, and it is part of our business here to make ourselves perfect. We often say we could do so much better if we were somewhere else, and that it is other people who make us naughty. It's like the old story of Adam, who said Eve made him eat the apple. But we don't think much of Adam's excuse, and I am sure you will agree that Michael Angelo, who refused to let others spoil his work or his life, was much grander. I wonder which you are like? Do you let things round you spoil your work? I'm sorry to say I know one boy, and not a very small one either, who lets anything spoil his lessons. Even a fly can do it! When he leaves and goes to work, as he must do soon, he will find that his unlearned lessons and his ignorance will hinder him from getting on as he should do.

And I knew a girl who used to get into dreadful passions and scream and fight because her brother teased her. Of course, I don't think much of her brother for plaguing her, but if only she had remembered that it was just the spoiling of the outside of the marble! Her best plan would have been to take care that it should not spoil her life. It would have helped if she had remembered Jesus, and that when men called him names, and struck him, and even spit on him, he never answered back, until, at the last, when they crucified him, he was able to pray to his Father to forgive them. He never allowed anyone to spoil his life. It was said of him that he was like a block of stone, which was despised and rejected by the builders at first, but afterwards found to be so good and strong that at last it was made the corner-stone.

And we must remember, too, that there is an angel in each of the people round us. It seems very hard to believe it sometimes. Of course, we all know how very nice we can be ourselves, but we don't always realise that other people, right inside, are quite as nice as we are. Something perhaps has spoilt them outside, but if we are just loving and helpful to them we shall find there is beauty underneath. In one of our prisons the other day a man was shut up in a punishment cell for striking a warder. He was not at all a pleasant-looking man, and the jailers only saw the wild beast in him, fierce and cunning. But there were some mice in the cell, and they saw more. They saw in him the Angel of Love, and fearlessly they ran up his arms and round his neck. A gentleman who visited the jail, taught by the mice, also saw the Angel. He spoke kindly of the man's pets, and his kind words broke through the hard, ugly outside of the poor prisoner and reached his heart, so that he sobbed out his repentance. We hope in the future he will be able to carve his life into something good and beautiful, and show the world the angel which is in him as it is in each one of us.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING.

THE proceedings of the Whitsuntide Assembly were resumed on Thursday morning last week, when the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held at Essex Hall, under the presidency of Mr. George H. Leigh. There was a large attendance of the members of the Association.

The Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and the Treasurer, Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke, submitted the annual report and statement of accounts, the Treasurer remarking that with an income down to £6,194 the Association had still managed to live within its means. This, however, was largely owing to the fact that during the absence of the Secretary in Canada some of the publishing engagements of the Committee had been in abeyance, and estimated expenses had thus been postponed. The subscriptions were down £170; and the large donations, including one of £1,000, given in 1903, and contingent on the promise of a number of other special subscriptions, had now come to an end. If that income could be restored it would be spent in missionary work. He had pleasure in announcing the completion of the Sustentation Fund, which had reached the sum of £52,025, including interest to the amount of £1,669. They congratulated the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson on the successful accomplishment of this undertaking; and when the Fund became fully operative it would have the effect of setting free some portion of the funds of the Association for increased missionary efforts.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson acknowledged the congratulations on the completion of the Fund, and mentioned the share taken in the work by the Treasurer, Mr. F. W. Monks, and the Secretary, the Rev. J. Harwood. Mr. Dowson said that when he was President of the National Conference two things were before his mind, one of which was that the Association and the Conference should work together as one man; and this money, however hard they might have begged, would never have been obtained unless that union had been made real.

The President, in moving the adoption of the reports, also joined in the congratulations on the completion of the fund, and then referred to some of the special features of the Association's work. He spoke highly of the Pioneer Preachers' movement and of the Van Mission, and proceeded to emphasise the importance of active co-operation among our organisations, which he believed would be in the general interest of the Unitarian body. The position and leadership of ministers, and their relation to men and affairs, were also discussed, as well as the dependence of the Association upon the co-operation of the churches up and down the country.

The Rev. E. Savell Hicks, of Dublin, seconded the adoption of the reports in a few words of hearty appreciation of the work of the Association, and strongly urged the importance of more publicity being given to the church services.

On the motion of Dr. Blake Odgers, seconded by Mr. F. W. Monks, Mr. Leigh was thanked for his services as President during 1913-14, and Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., was elected for the ensuing year. The retiring President then referred to the interest he had found in the work of the Association, which he hoped and expected he would be able still to retain; and the new President said he had taken the office very largely because his father (Sir John Brunner) had filled the office some years ago. But as even hereditary institutions had to justify themselves in this country, it would be his duty to justify his acceptance of the office.

The Committee and officers were then elected, as follows:—Chairman of the Committee, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant; treasurer, Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke; auditors, Mr. H. Gimson and Mr. E. Furnival Jones; Committee, Mrs. Bartram, Mr. G. W. Brown, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Miss Clephan, the Rev. C. Hargrove, the Rev. J. Harwood, Mr. Charles Hawksley, Miss Herford, Mr. R. P. Jones, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mr. E. W. Monks, Mr. R. M. Montgomery, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. A. H. Punnett, the Rev. C. J. Street, Miss Tagart, Mr. A. A. Tayler, Mr. Harold Wade, Mrs. Wooding. The Rev. Charles Roper, who retires from the Committee on his removal to West Kirby, was elected a member of the Council.

Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant were appointed representatives of the Association on the Board of Management of the Sustentation Fund.

It was agreed that the Committee should take steps to secure the incorporation of the Association, so that its property may in future be vested without the necessity of appointing and re-appointing trustees.

A resolution on the Hundred Years of Peace between this country and America was then submitted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. The resolution prayed that future differences should be settled, should they arise, by an appeal to reason and conscience and never again by the barbarous arbitrament of the sword. Mr. Tarrant hoped the occasion of this celebration might arouse the attention of people in all parts of the world to the futile war system of negotiation. He rejoiced that many of our compatriots had taken a leading part in promoting sentiments of peace between the two countries, and recalled the step forward in favour of arbitration at the instance of Mr. Taft.

The next resolution expressed sympathy with men and women who in all lands are striving to promote pure religion and perfect liberty, and offered a welcome to the representatives of kindred organisations. Prior to the passing of the resolution a letter of greeting from Bishop Ferencz, of the Hungarian Unitarian churches, was read, in which he expressed the fraternal interest of Transylvanian Unitarians in the prosperity of their English brethren.

Thanks were voted to the local treasurers of the Association for their efforts in collecting subscriptions, and to the congregations for the annual collections in aid of the funds of the Association; to the Rev. Alfred Hall, preacher of the Annual Sermon; the congregation at Islington for the use of the chapel, and to friends in London who had extended hospitality to delegates and visitors; and a welcome was also offered to the following new ministers who had entered on their duties in our religious community since the last annual meeting:—The Rev. E. G. Evans, Dudley; the Rev. E. T. Evans, Aberdare; the Rev. J. C. Flower, Sale; the Rev. J. Hinkins, Accrington; the Rev. A. H. Lewis, Pendleton; the Rev. D. B. Martin, Finchley; the Rev. A. V. Moody, Horsham; the Rev. R. F. Rattray, Liverpool; and the Rev. J. W. Saunders, Liverpool.

Mr. J. C. Warren had given notice of his intention to move a resolution in favour of instituting a committee for the purpose of collecting and safeguarding historical matter relating to our churches, and empowering the Association to take the necessary steps to give effect to the resolution. He spoke of similar societies in other bodies, and mentioned that the Rev. Alexander Gordon was a member of the Council of the Congregationalist Society and wrote for that body. The Friends had such a society as well as the Baptists, and also the English Presbyterians. He believed the effort would be of much use. Some dozen years ago the National Conference was asked to take the matter up, and he (Mr. Warren) was appointed a member of the committee, but he had never been able to obtain any information as to whether meetings would be held. Hence his action in approaching the Association.

Mr. Warren's proposal was warmly welcomed, and several speakers spoke as to the necessity for such a piece of work being undertaken. Miss Tagart seconded the resolution, and referred to the interest evoked by the collection of historical memorials made at Birmingham on the occasion of the Conference there. The Rev. A. Hall and the Rev. A. H. Shelley also supported; the Rev. A. Hurn dissented on the ground that the Association business was to make history, not to preserve its records. The Secretary, however, pointed to the rules which would cover the proposed action, and urged that it would help to preserve the civil rights of the churches if the records themselves were preserved. He mentioned that the Association had spent nearly £100 in legal expenses during last year in order to prevent a small poor chapel being filched from us. Had the records been easily available it would have saved the Association perhaps half that expenditure. The Revs. W. W. C. Pope and S. A. Mellor also supported the proposal, and the resolution was carried without dissent.

MISSIONARY WORK OF THE ASSOCIATION.

A conference on the missionary work of the Association had been announced, with addresses by the chairman of the Foreign and Colonial Committee (the Rev. Charles Hargrove), the Home Mission Committee (Mr. Roland P. Jones), and the Publications Committee (Mrs. Wooding). Time, however, did not permit Mrs. Wooding to tell the story of what had been done by her committee, and the two other addresses were also shortened. A remark of Mr. Hargrove's, to the effect that the difficulty in the way of the Foreign Committee's work arose from the want of knowledge on the part of many of their supporters as to what is being done, applies almost equally to the whole operations of the Association, and we commend a careful perusal of the annual report to those who care to see how far the operations of the Association extend, and how necessary it is that the resources available for the work should be maintained.

The Rev. Charles Hargrove mentioned many of the lands to which the Association sends assistance, and its active co-operation with the American Unitarian Association in efforts for the dissemination and maintenance of Unitarianism and liberal religion generally in Europe and the Colonies, as well as in remote parts of the world where pure religion is striving to express itself. He spoke particularly of the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie's mission to Canada, and hoped men would be found willing to respond to the call for service there. He knew the men were wanted at home as well; but he urged that we gained by what we gave; otherwise he would have had no part in the work. What we gave was very small compared with the great efforts of the other denominations; but it was right that we should do all we could.

Mr. Roland P. Jones pointed out that the object of the Conference was that suggestions might be forthcoming from the members of the Association. This was particularly so in regard to the Home Mission work. He defined the relation of the Pioneer Preachers to the Association, and proceeded to discuss the effects that the raising of the new Sustentation Fund might have upon the operations of the Association. One of these was the removal of the burden of supporting fully established churches. But if people assumed that because of the success of the Fund they might reduce their subscriptions to the Association, then no one would be better off. He hoped, in regard to the new Historical Society, that some sort of architectural branch might be formed. In the Headquarters at Beacon-street, in Boston, they had on the walls photographs of all the churches in the country. Declaring himself to be still under the impressions of his American visit, Mr. Jones protested against the habit at home of conferring too much about ourselves. We are using up a great deal of energy, he urged, which might more profitably be diverted into active missionary work. It was possible to get into a position like that of Mark Twain's Mississippi steamer, which had to stop the engines when it wanted to whistle. We want to get out of the habit of too frequently feeling our pulse; and to embark instead on some solid and romantic missionary work. In the history of the Mansford-street Mission they had the record of the work of Mr. S. W. Preston and Mr. David Martineau. That was a wildly romantic experiment, and perhaps nowadays we should shrink from anything of the sort. But we ought to do some really rash thing that might not succeed at all. In any case it was better than a too cautious and tentative policy. He hoped the outcome of the request that had been sent to the local societies would result in such practical suggestions that during the coming winter they might be able to launch out in new directions.

Mr. Charles Hawksley spoke in support of the Historical Society, and was followed by the Rev. A. Charlesworth, who suggested that in any new missionary work the Association should adopt a policy of concentration on a particular district, rather than diffusion of its energies over a number of areas simultaneously. The Rev. Thos. Paxton advocated holiday services abroad; and the Rev. H. E. Dowson showed how in the East Cheshire district they could find room for all the funds which the Association hoped to have at its disposal for the new work. The Rev. H. B. Smith urged the necessity for a Chapel Building Loan Fund, free of interest, and Mr. Jones intimated that for London such a fund was already in existence.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, chairman of the Executive Committee, wound up the discussion; expressed regret that the time had not allowed any discussion of the publication department, and hoped that next year there would be a great move forward in all the work of the Association.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE SOCIAL SERVICE UNION.

DR. CARLYLE ON SOCIAL UNREST.

THE annual meeting was held on the afternoon of the 14th inst., the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson in the chair. Miss C. Gittins submitted the annual report. Among other interesting items it referred to the formation of branches, that at Birmingham being a large one, and to the establishment of the Council of Christian Witnesses, which aimed to draw together all those who felt that the spirit of Christianity should be applied to every relation of life. The Union had taken part in the gathering at Swanwick, and hoped to do so again this summer.

Mr. Weiss submitted the Treasurer's report, which showed funds in hand.

Resolutions were passed adopting the reports, thanking the retiring officers, and appointing officers and committee for the ensuing year.

Miss Lucas moved and Mr. R. Robinson seconded the following resolution, which was carried:—"Holding as Christians that the individual life of every person is sacred and that it is therefore intolerable for any department of our industry to be carried out under conditions which involve the misery and want of the labourer, we believe it to be the fundamental Christian principle of wages that the first charge upon any industry should be the proper maintenance of the labourer, and we therefore declare our adhesion to the principle of the living wage, and pledge ourselves to co-operate in promoting its extended application in whatever way we can, both by our private and public action."

The Chairman then called upon Dr. A. J. Carlyle to address them. As chairman of the Committee of Manchester College, Oxford, he regarded Dr. Carlyle as his near neighbour, and he rejoiced at the goodwill indicated by the presence of Dr. Carlyle among them that afternoon, and also of Dean Inge on the previous day.

Dr. A. J. Carlyle said he fully shared in the neighbourly regard expressed by the Chairman. Unless they as Christian people could combine together, they had no right to expect any share in the application of their principles to practical life which was coming. By co-operating together for practical ends they got over many other difficulties. It was not his intention to speak to them of the application of the principles of religion to social life on that occasion, but rather to point out the form of certain difficulties which had arisen during the last four or five years. Sometimes he thought we missed the meaning of what was happening by not putting things together. What, he asked, are the causes of the present troubles in the industrial world? The chief cause, he thought, was the steady advance in the price of commodities, while wages had stopped rising in proportion. It had been stated that the difference was as much as 15 or 20 per cent. against the worker, though this was doubted by some. In consequence of this the policy of conciliation had broken down. The authority of the labour leaders, who, it should be recognised, had always stood for conciliation, had weakened, and the rank and file were now against conciliation. However much we may deplore this we must at least allow that it is natural. While adequate wages could be secured by peaceful means all was well, but when conciliation failed other measures must be adopted. It was well that the public should know that the policy of the labour leaders had been for peace. Now Syndicalism was coming to the front. It was a word difficult to define, but for practical purposes it might be regarded as a reversion to the revolutionary principles of forty years ago. We may deplore this, we may feel it our duty to resist these forces, but we should do wrong to undervalue the cause of them. And the first and most disquieting indication is not the general strike. He saw no signs of any attempt at a general strike, but the "sympathetic strike," whereby workers not immediately affected by the dispute thought it their duty to join in. This was disconcerting, and the results social confusion. Moreover, he was afraid that the practice would tend to grow. Again from our point of view we may regard this as wrong-headed, but we must also own that it is very magnanimous of the workers and shows a growing sense of solidarity on their part, and the recognition that it is the duty of the strong to stand by the weak. They were learning that they were members of society. Then another truth has flashed upon the workers and society alike, one that should have been recognised long ago if we had been consistent thinkers, namely, that society is really in the hands of the workers, that only a few forms of industry have to be suspended and the whole social system is put out of gear. On account of this we have during the last few years witnessed Government interference. Further difficulties may be looked for in this direction. Again we may deplore the facts, and point out that the workers themselves are the first to suffer, but at the same time we must own that they take it very patiently, and do not fume like the average middle class man. He was no prophet of evil, but these were serious matters, though he did not say there was no way out. The facts must be faced, however, and while he was not there to advocate any system, it seemed inevitable that a larger control of industry would have to be undertaken by society. Once it was thought that Government would only have to deal with sweated industries, but it was evident that other sections must be controlled by it. Something might be lost thereby, but there would also be a gain. In the end the only solution could be that the nation must become a great Christian society, governed by the great Christian ideals which were summed up in love to God and love to man.

The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, in moving a vote of thanks, said that one thing was certain, that the workers were convinced of the utter futility of Parliament to help them.

The Rev. Stanley A. Mellor, in seconding, recalled his Oxford days, when, perhaps all unknown to the lecturer, he had learned from him the first steps in social service. The problem of the submerged tenth and the problem of the skilled worker were two separate questions. In dealing with the latter they must never forget that they were dealing with personalities.

THE NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

PUBLIC MEETING.

THE anniversary meetings of the Unitarian Temperance Association were held on Friday, June 5. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, the President, was in the chair, and in the course of his address extended a cordial welcome to those who were for the first time taking an active share in temperance work. The younger generation ought to be heartened to go on and make their own lives happier and the world better by their efforts. Among the many reasons which made him in earnest about temperance work he mentioned the sad fact that in the course of his own experience he had known six ministers whose work had been rendered ineffective, and their lives dishonoured, because they had succumbed to the fatal habit of intemperance. With their disgrace they were all besmirched, for they were all members one of another, and most people could match this experience, no matter to what group or section of society they belonged. He pleaded that all present, whatever their position might be, should try to stem this great evil, however insidiously and seductively it was presented to them, and as far as possible use their efforts so that the rising generation might be protected against its temptations. He recommended them to equip themselves by procuring Mr. Guy Hayler's "Prohibition Advance in all Lands," which was full of valuable information about the progress of the Temperance cause all over the world.

The Rev. Dr. Crooker, President of the American Unitarian Temperance Society, said he brought the meeting good tidings from America. They had in his country at the present time a Cabinet committed by personal practice to total abstinence, and they had recently had two weddings in the White House at which no wine was drunk. The Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, who drew a good many gibes upon himself when he explained at the beginning of his term of office that he was a total abstainer, had won the respect of the nation, and the Secretary of the Navy had recently issued an order abolishing the officers' wine mess. The grog ration they had abolished at the close of the Civil War. It was a great thing to have a national administration committed, not in theory but by personal preference, in a purely simple but earnest way, to the position which they themselves occupied. The law was also helping them in their struggle, all through the industrial world the temperance cause was mightily effective, and it was a significant thing that one of the most influential newspapers in America, the Chicago Record Herald, had just recently made a public declaration that they would no longer print liquor advertisements in their columns. Other newspapers had done something of the sort, but none with the prominence of the Record Herald. In addition to this the doctors and druggists of America were seriously considering whether they could not eliminate brandy and whiskey from the pharmacopœia of the country. The best doctors were no longer using it themselves. In almost all cases alcohol was more harmful than good, and gave not life but death. There was, however, a feature of the situation which was perplexing and troubling many people, namely, that in the last few years the consumption of intoxicating liquor in America per capita of the population had increased faster than the growth of the population, the latter being a little over 2 per cent., the former a little under 4 per cent. This fact is taken advantage of by men engaged in the drink trade, who say that as the "dry" territory increases the consumption of liquor also increases. There were many things which had to be taken into account in regard to this state of things, for instance, the use of alcohol in industries, which had greatly increased. Thousands and thousands of gallons were used every year in the orange growing districts where frost-bitten oranges are subjected to an alcohol bath. Then, again, the city population was everywhere growing. The cities were "wet," and those who were interested in the drink traffic were spending millions of dollars in trying to force their goods upon the public. It was a most unfortunate fact that drinking among women was on the increase, and, in addition to this, they were receiving into their country every year vast numbers of foreigners, most of whom were alcohol drinkers, and when they settled in the United States their appetite seemed to be stimulated. The truth was, not that the population as a whole was drinking more, but that they had had an immense influx of drinking people into their country. In Boston, last year, a city of less than 700,000 people, there were over 50,000 arrests for drunkenness. These facts, however, ought not to discourage the apostle of temperance, for they were doing very well considering their great difficulties. The whole temperance problem had radically changed in the last ten years, and they were seeing it in a new light. They now knew that they were fighting what was really nothing but an ancient superstition supported by organised greed—the superstition that alcohol is a life-giver. People were drinking not because they were vicious, but because they believed this, and because it was the social custom, and the only way to give them liberty from the thralldom which destroyed them was by every possible method of education.

Miss Harriet M. Johnson, who was the National British Women's Temperance Association delegate to the Convention of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union held in Brooklyn, U.S.A., gave some interesting figures illustrative of the remarkable progress of prohibition in the United States and Canada. Seven years ago, when she was in America for the first time, it was being said by the women there that in 25 years' time they would clear the liquor traffic out of the United States. On the occasion of her second visit it was confidently said at the Convention she attended that they would have national constitutional prohibition in 1920. She herself believed that they would certainly get it then, if not sooner. In one thing the Americans seemed ahead of English people: they believed what the doctors told them, and the doctors are telling them that alcohol is a bad thing. In the industrial world the question was being seriously taken up, and a number of railways and workshops had made it a condition that their workers should be total abstainers.

The following resolution was proposed in a vigorous speech by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P.:—"That this meeting of members and friends of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, knowing the serious evils resulting from the use of intoxicating liquors, greatly regrets the delay in introducing the long-promised Licensing Bill, and respectfully calls upon His Majesty's Government to bring in a thorough measure of temperance reform without further delay, and to lose no time in carrying it through Parliament." Mr. Chancellor laid great stress on the increasing urgency of the question, and the necessity for strengthening the hands of those members of Parliament who are endeavouring to get temperance measures passed, and in every way proving to the Government, since all Governments only acted under pressure, that public opinion is thoroughly awake on this matter. Since 1909 the drink bill had considerably increased, and the prosecutions for drunkenness had gone up to about 179,000. A drink bill of 10 millions more than it was five years ago indicated a very serious position. They had to fight the vested interests of the drink trade, which was able to bring tremendous forces into the field, and which was more united, and possibly more enthusiastic than the temperance movement. They had to make their demands loud, insistent, effective, and constant, and then they would get the long-promised measure they were asking for.

Mr. F. R. Nott seconded the resolution. There was, he said, special need for legislation to protect the young people in the time of adolescence, which it was admitted on all hands was the most dangerous period, and the period when those habits were rapidly formed which often proved so disastrous in later life.

Mr. Lupton expressed his disapproval of the terms of the resolution, and gave it as his opinion, as a temperance worker for 50 years, that, by closing public-houses and prohibiting the sale of drink, intemperance was increased, as Dr. Crooker's figures had proved was the case in America; or, what was still worse, the taking of drugs and opiates. He insisted on the necessity for wise and gradual legislation and the constant education of public opinion. His suggested amendment, that the Association should draft a report as to the best means for supporting temperance which should be brought before the next annual meeting found no seconder, and was dropped, and the resolution was carried.

BRITISH LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN WOMEN.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the British Women's League was held at Essex Hall, on Wednesday, June 3, at 3 p.m., Mrs. Blake Odgers, the president, in the chair. Miss V. Preston, joint hon. secretary, read the minutes, and the Chairman extended a cordial welcome to the delegates, who would, she was sure, join with her in sending a message of goodwill to their friends in the oversea dominions and in America. It was their great desire to be in close contact with the League members wherever they existed, and to realise the bond of fellowship which drew them all together. She also referred to Miss Grace Mitchell's tour in the Dominions, which she had described to them since her return, and which had done so much to stimulate the interest of the women in those far-off churches in Australia and New Zealand. Several interesting paragraphs were read from the report by Miss Brooke Herford, organising hon. secretary. Eleven new branches had been added to the roll since March, 1913, and four societies have dropped out, so that the list now stands at ninety-nine, but the outstanding feature of the year's work had been the strengthening of local associations. The committee has decided to help Mrs. Baart de la Faille in her work among the young Dutch women who came over to England, and by means of the Anglo-Dutch agency will endeavour to help them to find situations, or put them in communication with those who wish to take them as pupils or boarders. The reports of the Publications Department and Fellowship Section were read by Mrs. Wilson and Miss Grace Mitchell, respectively, and Mrs. Sydney Martineau, hon. treasurer, presented a satisfactory financial statement, which showed that the League was in a perfectly sound and solvent position with a substantial balance in hand. Mrs. Martineau referred to the loss they had sustained in the death of Mrs. Rutt, Mrs. J. A. Agate, Mrs. Jones, and Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence. To the generosity of the latter they owed the special fund which had been of great service to them. The resolution adopting the reports was moved from the chair, and seconded by Miss Johnstone, of Bury, president of the new Manchester District Associate League.

A series of resolutions dealing with a revision of the constitution, and some proposed alterations in the rules, which the League had outgrown as it had developed, were then moved from the chair, seconded and discussed in rotation, and carried, with the exception of one clause relating to the objects of the League. It had been proposed that, with a view to widening the scope of the League, and preventing its work from assuming too limited and sectarian a character, the clause relating to the principal object of the League:—"To quicken the religious life of our churches, and to bring Unitarian women into closer co-operation and fellowship," should run:—"To bring Unitarian and other Liberal Christian women into closer co-operation and fellowship, and to quicken the religious life of the churches." This aroused considerable discussion, and ultimately an amendment, moved by Miss Harriet Johnson and seconded by Mrs. Tarrant, was carried, to keep the original form of words with the addition of "and other Liberal Christian," after the word "Unitarian." It was also agreed that in future voting should be through the representatives, and that individual members should not have the power to vote, this being in accordance with the method adopted by modern democratic societies. The election of the officers and committee for the ensuing year was moved by Mrs. Stevenson, president of the Upperthorpe Branch, Sheffield, seconded by Mrs. Grausse, and carried.

THE CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission was held on Thursday afternoon, June 4, at Essex Hall, Miss Clephan in the chair. The report was presented by Miss Florence Hill, hon. secretary, who read several passages, and commented briefly on the work of the Mission. The report states that applications for literature have come from 1,118 new correspondents, while there are 1,852 old correspondents still on the books. The Committee are in constant touch with Signor Conte, whose efforts for the spread of liberal religion in Italy are meeting with success. In the autumn he made a short tour, passing through Venice, Milan, Bergamo, Parma, Udine, Turin, and Bologna, visiting adherents and sympathisers. He was very cordially received. Unanimous appreciation of the "Riforma" was expressed, Dr. della Lena, Prof. Cervesato, Dr. Diaz de Palma, and others all thoroughly approving of the lines on which the periodical is conducted. The editorship is extremely onerous, and lately Don Romolo Murri, the celebrated ex-deputy and modernist, has consented to collaborate with S. Conte. S. Conte carries on a large correspondence by letter, which he looks on as a Postal Mission. Many of these letters are of a very private and intimate nature, and it is evident that he is able to bring help and comfort to many a storm-tossed soul. Mr. W. H. Sands, who has been appointed to take charge of the Suffolk Village Mission, reports satisfactory progress, the congregation having increased from 12 to 40. At Framlingham new trustees have been appointed for the Old Meeting House, and fresh interest has been awakened. The committee are impressed with the opportunities opening out under the changing social and agricultural conditions, and believe that a new life awaits these old country chapels.

Miss Clephan moved the adoption of the report. She thought it was significant that the largest number of applications for information on religious questions came through the medium of such papers as the Daily Citizen, the Christian Commonwealth, Everyman, and the Labour Leader, showing that the liberal message was being carried over a wide field, and that they were leaving the roofs and walls in which they had themselves found a home to go out into the open and give the truth they had received to others outside.

The Rev. Maurice Elliott gave some personal experiences, and explained that he owed his present position among Unitarians to the help and sympathy given at a critical time by the Postal Mission. Mr. Snow, of Accrington, in an earnest speech, spoke of the great encouragement and hope which many earnest inquirers known to him had received as a result of letters and books sent to them during their search for a deeper and more catholic faith. Miss Tagart congratulated the Postal Mission workers in America, Holland, and Hungary, but expressed her regret that so few people with leisure at their disposal, though drawn into many social movements, were willing to give themselves to this unseen, quiet work, the value of which was increasing year by year. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Miss Van Eck, of the Dutch Postal Mission, Mr. Percival Chalk, and Mr. W. H. Sands, also spoke, and the adoption of the report was carried. The officers were re-elected for the ensuing year.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE. MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at Dr. Williams's Library, London, on Wednesday, the 3rd inst. There were present: Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone (in the chair), Revs. D. Agate, Dr. Carpenter, Rudolf Davis, A. H. Dolphin, H. E. Dowson, W. H. Drummond, E. D. P. Evans, F. K. Freeston, H. Gow, Alfred Hall, C. Hargrove, C. Roper, M. Rowe, A. L. Smith, C. J. Street, W. G. Tarrant, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, Jos. Wood, Messrs. Ronald P. Jones, W. Byng Kenrick, G. H. Leigh, J. Lewis, F. W. Monks, Ion Pritchard, G. E. Verity, J. Wigley, L. N. Williams, G. W. R. Wood, and the Secretary (the Rev. James Harwood).

Apologies for absence were received from Sir W. B. Bowring, Bart., the Revs. J. A. Kelly, W. H. Lambelle, H. D. Roberts, Messrs. H. Bailly, H. P. Greg, T. Fletcher Robinson, Grosvenor Talbot, A. S. Thew, J. Harrop White, and P. J. Winsor.

Among other business the following was transacted:—

On behalf of the Committee the Rev. H. E. Dowson tendered a hearty welcome to the President on resuming his position after nearly a year's absence, caused by great sorrow and serious illness. The President briefly replied with much feeling.

On the motion of Mr. W. Byng Kenrick seconded by the Rev. Joseph Wood, and supported by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, the following resolution was carried, all standing:—

"That the Committee have heard with the greatest sorrow of the death of their colleague, the Rev. J. Worsley Austin. Mr. Austin's services to the Conference in various ways, and especially at the last Triennial Meetings, the success of which he largely promoted as one of the local Hon. Secretaries, and the career which seemed to lie before him of increasing honour and usefulness in our ministry, render his loss peculiarly sad and widely felt. The Committee desire to tender to Mrs. Austin and her relatives the assurance of deepest sympathy in their bereavement."

The Rev. R. Nicol Cross, of Leeds, was co-opted to fill the vacancy thus created.

The Treasurer's statement, estimating a slight balance in hand at the end of the year on June 30, was received.

A cordial invitation from the Mill Hill Congregation, Leeds, to hold the next Triennial Meetings in 1915 in that city was gratefully accepted, on the motion of the Rev. Dr. Carpenter. The dates fixed were April 13 to 16.

A request from the Sunday School Association that Sunday-school work should be recognised on the programme was heartily agreed to, and a special committee, with power to add, was appointed to prepare a Draft.

The Revs. Joseph Wood and James Harwood were appointed to represent the Conference on the committee for revising the list of ministers in the "Essex Hall Year Book."

The Special Committee for raising the £50,000 Fund reported that (including accrued interest) about £52,000 had been promised, as well as £109 in new and increased annual subscriptions. In consequence of this great success it was hoped that the managers of the Sustentation Fund would be able to remove the differentiation between grants in aid of English and Welsh stipends. A resolution was adopted in support of this proposal.

Cordial thanks were given to the Revs. H. E. Dowson, Jas. Harwood, and Mr. F. W. Monks for their special services to the Fund, and the officers were requested to express through a letter in the papers hearty thanks to all the donors.

The next meeting of the Committee will be held in Birmingham in October.

* * Owing to pressure on our space we are obliged to hold over the Rev. A. Hall's sermon preached before the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and our report of Mrs. Besant's lecture at Queen's Hall last Sunday evening till next week.

SPEECH DAY at Willaston School, Nantwich, will be held on Wednesday, June 17, and at the meeting in the Gymnasium at 2.45 the speakers will be the Chairman, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, the Headmaster, Mr. H. Lang Jones, and Dr. J. Edwin Odgers.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bradford.—The anniversary services were held at Pepperhill Chapel on Sunday, June 7. The Rev. Thomas Paxton, of Bradford, preached the sermons, and the chapel was crowded both in the afternoon and evening. The collections amounted to £14 5s. 7d.

General Baptist Assembly.—The 264th annual meeting of the General Baptist Assembly was held at the General Baptist Unitarian Church, Deptford, on Wednesday, June 3. The chair was taken by Mr. Walker, of Trowbridge, and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:—President, Mr. Edward Chitty, of Dover; vice-president, Mr. E. A. Carlier, minister of Deptford; secretary, the Rev. C. A. Ginever, of Dover; treasurer, Mr. A. Walker, of Trowbridge. Following upon the above proceedings, two messengers were elected by vote. In the place of the Rev. J. Brinkworth (deceased), Mr. E. A. Carlier, of Deptford Church; and in the place of the Rev. Harvey Smith (resigned), Mr. Bond, of the Portsmouth Church.

Horsham.—The Whitsunday services at the Free Christian Church were conducted by Dr. W. Evans Darby. There was a large attendance of friends from neighbouring districts. Dr. Darby referred to the historical associations of the time, the bi-centenary of the death of Matthew Caffyn and the centenary of that of John Dendy, both of them honoured pastors of the church. The congregation at Horsham had virtually been in existence for nearly 300 years, for Matthew Caffyn, when a young man, had joined Samuel Lover in a congregation which was already founded. Forcefully he argued and laboured for that which was truth to him; that his memory had endured for so many years was, in itself, the finest tribute to his character; and those who in these days saw so much of societies formed only to dissolve, and committees whose existence was evanescent, could the more appreciate the permanence of the work so deeply embedded in the rock of truth. Yet he was the more attracted by the later pastor, who left less mark on the world about him, but whose congregation so evidently appreciated and loved him, and who recorded his passing from them with the expression of the hope that those who had reason to revere his memory would imitate his many virtues. He recommended this estimate of John Dendy, who died in 1814, to the young people who listened to him to-day, and prayed them, in their own day and generation, to labour for the spread and increase of the faith and faithfulness of the past.

Kendal: The late Mr. John Affleck.—The Market-place congregation at Kendal has suffered the loss of its most distinguished member by the death of Mr. John Affleck, M.A., D.Sc., of Castle Mount, Kendal, who passed away on Thursday morning, June 4, at the age of 75. For the last nine years he had been a constant worshipper, and had taken part in the social activities and country rambles connected with the congregation, his genial personality being greatly esteemed by all who knew him. Mr. Affleck had been a Government Inspector of chemical works in the Widnes, Runcorn, and St. Helens districts, and for many years before that he was the manager of the Jarrold Chemical Works. He is survived by two sons, Mr. W. E. Affleck, of Texas, U.S.A., and Mr. G. B. Affleck, British Vice-Consul at Peking; and two daughters Miss Evelyn Affleck, and Mrs. Sheirwater, of Southport. Mr. Affleck was a native of Ayrshire. The funeral took place on Saturday, June 6, at Lochgoilhead, Argyllshire, where Mr. Affleck's wife was buried eleven years ago.

London: Acton.—Services in commemoration of the eighth anniversary of the Unitarian Church were held on Sunday last, June 7, the preacher at both services being the Rev. James Harwood, B.A. On Tuesday a public meeting was held, presided over by Mr. A. Savage Cooper, president of the London District Unitarian Society. Other speakers were the Revs. F. K. Freeston, J. Arthur Pearson, A. S. Hurn, and A. C. Holden (minister), Messrs. G. H. Fearn, and J. A. Wilkes. In his address the minister made an appeal for an increased attendance of members at the Sunday services, in view of both the present and the future interests of the church.

London: Kentish Town.—The preacher at the evening service on Sunday, June 14, at the Unitarian Church, Clarence-road, will be the Rev. Florence Kollock Crooker, M.A., who was formerly minister of churches in Boston, and Chicago, U.S.A.

London: Walthamstow.—The Young People's Fellowship in connection with the Unitarian Church held a week-end camp at Lambourne End at Whitsuntide, an experiment which proved very successful. On Sunday last the flower services were held, the Rev. Maurice Elliott, of Brixton, preaching in the afternoon; and Mr. F. G. Barrett Ayres, Pioneer Preacher, in the evening. The choir is in need of a conductor. Mr. R. W. Sorensen, 23, Highbury-place, N., will be glad to hear from any friend who is willing to offer his services.

Newport Isle of Wight.—The Sunday-school anniversary services in connection with the Unitarian chapel were celebrated on Sunday, June 7, when the sermons were preached by the Rev. T. P. Spedding.

Nottingham.—The honorary degree of a Fellowship of the Royal Society of Teachers of the Blind has just been bestowed upon Mr. J. C. Warren, whose acts of benevolence are well known, and who has specially devoted himself to the welfare of the blind. For nearly 30 years he has been the honorary secretary of the Royal Midland Institution for the Blind. The good work and influence of this great industrial training institution is not confined to Nottingham, nor even to the Midland district, but spreads throughout the whole of England. Its history is one of consistent progress, and Mr. Warren has been the inspiration of every advancing step during the last 25 years. The fellowship to which he has been elected is for distinguished service in the cause of the blind, and is only bestowed on those who have given very special and long-continued service to the cause.

Oldbury.—The Sunday school connected with the Unitarian Meeting House celebrated its anniversary on Sundays, May 24 and 31. On the first Sunday the preachers were the minister of the church (the Rev. H. C. Hawkins) in the morning, and the Rev. W. G. Topping, of Coseley, in the evening. In the afternoon the Rev. T. P. Yemans, of West Smethwick Congregational Church, addressed the children, parents, and friends. The anniversary was continued on Whitsunday evening, when the Rev. H. C. Hawkins was again the preacher. The congregations were large, and appreciated the singing by the children, who had been ably trained by the organist of the church (Mr. Fred Hall). The offertories were considerably above the average.

Pontypridd: The late Mr. Griffith Thomas.

—The church at Pontypridd has sustained a severe loss by the death of Mr. Griffith Thomas, which took place on Wednesday May 27. His attachment to Unitarianism dated from the starting of services at Pontypridd in 1892, at the first of which he intimated that he wished to share in the work. Ever since he faithfully attended the services, gave generous financial aid, and otherwise helped the movement by his wise counsel and advice. A little over a month ago he and Mrs. Thomas celebrated their golden wedding, and in an interview Mr. Thomas then gave to the Press, he expressed the satisfaction he felt at being privileged to take part in the establishment of a Unitarian Church at Pontypridd. He leaves behind a widow, two sons and one daughter. The funeral took place on Saturday, May 30. The Rev. W. A. Williams (Baptist), and the Rev. E. R. Dennis officiating. On Sunday a memorial service was conducted by the Rev. Geo. Neighbour, of Mountain Ash.

Portsmouth.—At the close of service on Sunday evening, June 7, at the General Baptist Church, St. Thomas's-street, Portsmouth, Mr. Long, chairman of the Cosham Parish Council, asked the minister and congregation to accept a large framed photograph of the late Sir John Bowring, F.R.S., who fifty years ago laid the foundation stone of the front portion of their church. The Rev. T. Bond, on behalf of himself and congregation, heartily thanked Mr. Long for his present, which, he said, would be much valued by them all as a memento. The chancel portion of the church was 222 years of age, but the front portion only 50 years. He well remembered the event referred to. The remaining debt involved had been repaid during his ministry of 28 years, and it was a source of sincere pleasure to find that the oldest Baptist Church in the borough had the best wishes and prayers of their fellow Christians.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE NEXT STEPS IN EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS.

A conference is to be held at London University on June 18, 19 and 20, under the auspices of a committee of representatives of the Fabian Education Group, King Alfred School Society, the Moral Education League, the National Union of Teachers, the Ratan Tata Foundation (London University), the School Medical Officers' Association, the Theosophical Society, the Theosophical Educational Trust, and the Women's Industrial Council. It promises to be of unusual interest, and among those who will give addresses are:—Dr. Cruickshank, of the Scottish Education Department (author of "School Clinics"), Dr. J. L. A. Paton, Professor J. H. Muirhead, Dr. Letitia Fairfield (assistant M.O., L.C.C.), Dr. N. Bishop Harman, and Miss E. P. Hughes, who will take for her subject Red Cross work and Civics in Rural Areas. School feeding, the training of the adolescent, the status of the teacher, and the relation of the curriculum to industrial conditions will also be dealt with, and a number of prominent educationists have expressed their intention of being present and taking part in the discussion. Further particulars can be obtained from the secretary, Dr. L. Haden Guest, 16A, John-street, Adelphi, W.C.

THE PASSION PLAY IN ENGLAND.

We are glad to learn that there is no truth in the rumour that the Passion Play of Oberammergau is to be performed in England. To take it out of its proper setting, and bring it into juxtaposition with all the theatrical ventures of modern times would destroy its whole spirit, and an English garden "not a hundred miles from London" could not provide the atmosphere which surrounds the peasants who have been reverently trained to play their part in this act of thanksgiving to God in their native village. An official statement has been received from Herr S. Bauer, Burgomaster of Oberammergau, in which it is stated that none of the players in this sacred drama will perform anywhere but in Oberammergau, and that the announcements, which were probably made by an agent, are only intended to deceive the public, and are pure invention.

THE "TIMES" AND FOOD REFORM.

In its mammoth Food Number of 44 pages on Monday the Times did contrive to find room in an odd corner for an article on "Food Reform." The writer goes so far as to say that those who regard the exponent of a meatless diet as a crank, in comparison with the reformers have made a very cursory study of the all-important question of food. That the meals obtainable at a food-reform restaurant are not satisfying, to use the word in the sense that the majority of people use it, is, he goes on to say, a fallacy long since exploded. These meals are decidedly sustaining both for brain and manual workers, and they can satisfy all physical requirements without producing that heavy feeling that meat eating often produces. The article concludes with these words:—"Opponents of the movement have said that the average British navy could not exist without meat, and food reformers are just as emphatic that he could. Many farm servants in country districts have very little meat in their diet, but they are none the less physically ahead of town workers. The British soldier has tried a meatless diet and been fit and well on it. Therefore it is safe to say that were the real facts known to them thousands more would join the ranks of the food reformers."

WHITE. (9 men.)

White to play and mate in two moves.

SOLUTION OF No. 59.

1. B. Q2 (key-move).

Correct solutions have been received from W. E. Arkell, W. T. M. (Sunderland), F. S. M. (Mayfield), E. Wright, D. Amos, Rev. B. C. Constable. Those solvers who send 1. B. Kt4 overlook 1...Q. K2, which is an adequate defence.

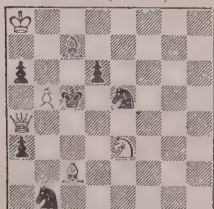

Correct solutions of No. 58 from Walter Coventry, D. Amos, Geo. Ingledew, A. S. Rodgers.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

REV. B. C. CONSTABLE.—There are too many men in your problem, whose exact use is not clear. Does not 1. Kt. B2 also suffice? With a little practice you should succeed in producing a good two-mover.

DR. C. G. HIGGINSON.—I wish you all good fortune in the competitions which you have entered.

No. 60 is reprinted as per margin. I most less, as a three-mover it is a very beautiful composition that will repay study.

sincerely regret that it was erroneously described as a two-mover, when in reality it is a three-mover. I must apologise to solvers, since unfortunately my remarks about the position do not imply that it is a mate in three, and therefore much fruitless analysis must have been bestowed on the problem. None the less, as a three-mover it is a very beautiful composition that will repay study.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EVERY now and again a portentous paragraph appears in the newspapers announcing that the Papal authorities at Rome have placed somebody's books on the Index. The latest victim to be pilloried is M. Bergson, whose writings are now forbidden to the faithful. Action of this kind must be regarded as a compliment. It testifies to the growing influence of a writer, and has the immediate effect of increasing his sales. We sometimes wonder how far the prohibitions of the Index have any influence among educated members of the Roman Church. We have the pleasure of numbering Roman Catholic families among our friends, and on several occasions have pointed out to our host forbidden volumes on his shelves. With a demure face, which does not conceal a slight twinkle in the eye, he replies that being on his shelves does not necessarily imply that he reads them! Then there are such things as reviews in the newspapers and magazines, so that while the book is banished from the home, the best part of its teaching, certainly the most revolutionary part, is boldly discussed in the columns of the Times or the Spectator. Ideas swept out of the front door have an odd way of coming in at the back door. Mrs. Partington with her broom was a very Solon compared with the Congregation of the Index and of the Holy Office. Rome may catalogue Bergson as tabu, but the people who count will only smile and go on purchasing his books.

WE note with pleasure the warm appreciation in the columns of the Christian World of the addresses given by the quartette of young ministers at the Essex Hall meeting on Wednesday evening, June 3. "Their speaking," it records, "reached a very high level," and it concludes by the assertion that "if there are many other young men like them in the Unitarian ministry, its future should be one of greater popular influence than its past has usually been."

THE resignation by Mr. Lewis of the King's Weigh House pulpit on the ground that a Christian minister (the "man of God") is in an inconsistent position as a highly paid official (£600 a year) of the Church, has given rise to a somewhat heated controversy in the columns of our able contemporary, the Christian Commonwealth, on the duty of ministers to live a life of poverty. Reproaches are brought against them for living in ease and luxury while so many of their neighbours are wanting bread. It is assumed that ministers, as a rule, receive a stipend and live in a style which is incompatible with the following of Jesus or the claims of the poor round about them. The reproach betrays a profound ignorance of the economic position of the great majority of ministers of all denominations. They know well what the life of poverty is by painful experience. More than one-half of them receive less than £200 a year, and not a few struggle on with half that amount. A skilled artisan is better paid than they. Even Sustentation Funds can only make their poverty a little less severe. They have renounced all chance of worldly gain and advancement that they may preach the Gospel. On the whole they set an example of "plain living and high thinking" which their critics might well imitate.

WHAT surprises one in going about among ministers is their cheerfulness and good humour under the financial strain from which they are never free. Dr. Burton, the successor to Horace Bushnell in the Hartford Congregational Church, U.S.A., once wrote: "I have been amazed at the answers given by some of our men to the question, How do you live? They have told me, sometimes in detail, and have made me both laugh and cry and inwardly shout; laugh and cry at the mingled pathos and humour of their stresses and distresses, and shout at the way they emerged from their emergencies, and at the strong spirit of life and gladness in their souls in despite of everything."

* * *

THE point at which a minister most longs for a little larger income is his library. There he is called to a self-denial which is more of a privation than anything else he must go without. Many a man feels that he would be a larger man and a more useful man if he had more books. As for the latest criticisms, or science, or philosophy, they hear of them afar, but can no more afford to buy Bergson, or Eucken, or Royce, or Schiller, or Oliver Lodge than they can afford to buy a portrait by Romney or Hals. Much in science they must admit, much in literature, and much in art. And they look at their poor array of well-thumbed volumes on their scanty shelves, and then the shilling they had set apart to buy the cheap edition of "Religio Medici" in Everyman's

Library goes instead to buy oranges for a sick child.

EVERY visitor to the United States is struck with the immense hopefulness of the people he meets. Something of the exhilaration which everywhere abounds is possibly due to the climate. In his Brooklyn home Henry Ward Beecher was a teetotaler. On visiting this country he was observed taking wine. Answering an implied reproach on his inconsistency he replied that in his own country the champagne was in the atmosphere, but that here the air was heavy and depressing. Whatever the cause, the optimism and buoyancy of the American is a noticeable feature of life in the States. The American Ambassador, Mr. Walter Hines Page, in a lecture at the Royal Institution on "Some Aspects of American Democracy," dwelt upon this point in words which the average Britisher with his innate conservatism and leaning on tradition might do well to take to heart. "The eyes of men are kept towards the future. There is no time nor chance to look backward. The phrase in our President's Address that roused the whole country was this: 'I call all forward-looking men to my side.' No man in the Republic is willing to confess that he is a backward-looking man. The prodigious educational effort (of the States) all looks to the future—millions of money and the best efforts of many of the best men are all spent on making to-morrow better than yesterday. 'What shall our children be?' not 'What were our forefathers?' is the insistent question. This is the explanation of the dominant note of hopefulness in American life."

* * *

THOSE of our readers, and they are many, who have welcomed Miss Crafer's articles on "Religion and the Supernormal," will be specially interested in the lecture given by Mme. Lipinska, M.D., and reported in the Times, on Psychotherapy and the Power of Suggestion. It will come home to many with surprise that the lecturer attaches great importance to the power of suggestion on the moral training of children. She holds that the function of suggestion in education is to intensify the natural capacity of the normal child by captivating and securing its attention. In the case of the abnormal her experience is that it is often most valuable in the treatment of children addicted to pilfering, falsehood, and other faults. Dr. Lipinska's definition of Psychotherapy is illuminating: "Psychotherapy is really a re-education, mental and physical, of those who are afflicted by certain nervous and mental disorders. In the future our medicine physical and psychical hygiene will very largely be insisted upon as inseparable. Only in this way can people be fitted to resist fatigue, or the strain upon the constitution due to disease, or to sorrow and pain attendant on life."

* * *

"NOTHING is more futile than what is often called ethical instruction," said the Bishop of Lichfield in a sermon preached at St. Paul's Cathedral. "Such teaching totally disregards the fact that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the difficulty is not a knowledge of the right thing, but a sufficient motive for doing it." Indeed nothing is more evident than the failure of ethics alone in regenerating power. It is not by the preaching of ethics that men are converted from evil to good. The drunkard knows perfectly well that drunkenness is bad, but his knowledge does not keep him out of the public-house. The thief knows that it is wrong to steal, but his knowledge does not keep him out of prison. Long ago the whole duty of man was expressed in the simplest and most beautiful language: "What doth the Lord require of thee, O man, but to do justly, and love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God." Yes, but to do justly requires an impelling motive. Hence the place of religion with its powers and affections. Out of love to one who is worthy of love men can do what in ordinary circumstances they find impossible. Even the sublime motive of right for right's sake is less effective than right for love's sake. That love is the fulfilment of ethics is an apostolic doctrine. In a thoughtful article on Personal Influence which appeared in the Times on Tuesday last, the writer makes the same point. "The spring of action in the average man is the desire to please some friend upon whom his affection has fastened. Herein lies the strongest appeal of the Christian religion in its purity—the insistence upon a Friend, full of love and interest, whom the most lonely or the most fastidious soul may endeavour to please."

* * *

THE "Day of Intercession" for the Anglican Church in Wales passed off with scanty attendances and scarcely a notice in the public press. The fact is, a good many Churchmen entirely disapproved of the use of organised prayer as a political instrument. It is all very well to jeer at the "political Nonconformist," but the Bishops as a rule are far more aggressive politicians than men like Dr. Clifford. Whatever the Anglican authorities may say, the "Day of Intercession" was a day of prayer for the overthrow of the Government and the call of Mr. Bonar Law to power. That may or may not be a desirable end, but to make it the motive and object of official prayer in churches which profess to be National, and the religious home of every Englishman, is to degrade and vulgarise a solemn function of the Church to the narrowest sectarian and political partisanship.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT.

THE RENDING OF THE VEIL.

By THE REV. ALFRED HALL, M.A.

"And Jesus cried again with a loud voice, and yielded up his spirit. And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom."—MATT. xxvii. 51.

IT is significant that the first event which is reported to have occurred after the death of Jesus is that the veil of the temple, which screened the Holy of Holies from the public gaze, was rent in twain from the top to the bottom. That inner sanctuary was supposed to be the dwelling-place of Jehovah himself, and it was shrouded in mystery. Only one man, the High Priest, was allowed to enter it, and he only, once a year. Its sanctity was jealously guarded; its holiness was respected by strangers. Had the veil actually been rent at the moment of the death of Jesus we should have found mention of the occurrence in the Jewish records and histories of the time. Nothing of greater importance could have happened than this rending of the veil.

How, then, are we to account for the story? Was it a base fabrication? By no means. It was a picturesque way of stating that when Jesus died the revelation of the Highest had been made to men, and even the Holiest, God himself, could be seen by them. That was the purpose of his teaching, and that was to be the outcome of his life. Henceforth, not one man only, but all men, could draw nigh unto God in any time and in any place. All were brothers; all were children of the Most High; all could have the divinest experiences. The veil had been rent from the top to the bottom. All distinctions were abolished; the day of priests was over; the religion of mediation and exclusiveness was at an end. The human soul had been emancipated, the days of the open vision had come.

Thus the foundations of faith were laid broad and deep in the soul of man. The temple of God was the human spirit; the law of God was written, not on tables of stone, but in hearts of flesh. And the greatest irony of Christian history is that Jesus, the herald of the good news that God is well-pleased in men, has been made the author of a sacerdotal order, and the source of its official power. As the late Auguste Sabatier pointed out, it is taught throughout the New Testament that the Holy Spirit is the common possession of all who seek God. "Monarchy and oligarchy," he wrote, "with their gradations in rank, have given place to a religious democracy, to the republic of fraternal souls, to the fundamental equality of citizens in the kingdom of God." The motto of the Christian brotherhood formed at Pentecost was: "I will pour out my Spirit on all flesh." What else could it be, seeing they were all filled with the Holy Spirit?

In his recent "Open Letter to the

The Annual Sermon preached before the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Unity Church, Islington, on Tuesday, June 2, 1914.

Clergy of his Diocese," the Bishop of Oxford writes: "I believe that no human organisation, and especially no religious organisation, can maintain itself unless it understands, and lets others understand, what principles it stands for." It is a statement which has the whole weight of history as its support, and it is one that we especially need to bear in mind. The Church that has no message has no right to exist. The minister who is not fired with the intensity of conviction and whose beliefs are vague, indefinite, and inconclusive, has no call to exercise the office of regular preaching. And some of us have been floundering in generalities; others have been trying to discover our connection with ecclesiastical history, ideas, and institutions, which were the reason of our predecessors' dissent; and others, again, confused by discordant voices, have been seeking the justification of our existence. At no time in our history was it more incumbent upon us that we "should undertake the painful duty of thinking" than at present. That is an obligation which we share with every other communion, and it is the inevitable demand of every age of inquiry. We must seek for the common principles which are the ground of our secession, the bond of our unity, and the inspiration of our activity. Unless, in spite of our boasted freedom, we can find a centre of allegiance and an ideal which compels our loyalty, we cannot hold together, but shall be scattered by those disruptive tendencies which work so surely whenever purpose is lacking. Necessity is laid upon all of us that we should carefully, seriously, and diligently consider what is the faith we have to proclaim to the world.

What is the need of our age, and are we able to meet it?

One of the new modern virtues is theological modesty. Even the most dogmatic theologians do not pretend to know and understand so much as their predecessors did. They no longer profess to be intimately acquainted with the counsels and purposes of the Deity. The plain man has called their premisses, their theological assumptions and scriptural interpretations, into question. If the experience of a working pastor counts for anything, then thoughtful men have no longer any interest in the theologies and Christologies based upon the so-called "evidences," nor in ideas and creeds which have no relation to their lives. They want to know more about the "Foundations" of faith, and more especially the meaning, purpose, and destiny of human life. The day of theological evidences is passing: the day of human relevancies is dawning.

More and more the emphasis is being laid, not upon Pope or Bible or Church, or Christ-idea, but upon man; more and more the demand is not for a traditional test, but a human test. Religion is languishing in the world to-day, because of the failure of the Church to supply its supreme need, and because of our failure too. For what is needed is not a New Theology, nor a new Christology, for both have been tried and proved their ineffectiveness, but a new Spiritual Anthropology—a doctrine about man which will explain the divine nature, possibility, and destiny of his being, and make evident how he is united with God and is finally responsible to him.

Can Unitarianism do anything to supply that need? If it cannot, it is doomed to pass away.

But I believe that we have in our possession all the means necessary for building up the very faith that corresponds to this demand, for whatever differences may have existed among us, our witness has been constant and unequivocal that the seat of authority is in the soul of man and that the only test possible is his spiritual experience. We have been charged with intellectual pride, because of our declaration that no veil shall hang between the soul and God.

It has been asserted over and over again, and it is reiterated in "Foundations," an able volume of essays by members of the younger school of Broad Churchmen, that "the Christian message is first and foremost a message about God." That is where we part company. To us, as we read the New Testament, the Christian message is first and foremost a message about man—his sonship to God and his kinship to his neighbour. Dr. Martineau at the beginning of his "Types of the Ethical Theory" makes the distinction plain and unmistakable. Whether you are going to lay the foundations of theology and ethics strong and unmovable depends upon the decision you make at the beginning of your undertaking. Will you "give the priority to Nature and God and resort to them as your nearest given objects," or "will you permit the human mind to take the lead of these objects in your inquiry"?

This is the point of departure and here our ways divide. Therefore, if any note of pleading can be uttered by us, who only ask that our principles be viewed in the full light of religious experience and be allowed to stand or fall by that test, it is just here. Will you start from those principles which are inherent in the soul of man, to which Jesus bore abundant testimony, and find your way from what is known to what is unknown, or will you begin with authoritative statements about the universe and God, and from these take your conception of that inward nature which you know immediately? If you know not man whom you have seen, how can you know God whom you have not seen?

For the verities of the religious life we find ourselves, as Unitarians, driven back upon the inmost being of man. The soul: it knows. The spirit: it comprehends. The deep: it holds the secret. Yet we are not isolated beings, but a community of souls, all drawing from the same divine life. Sometimes when we are on a high mountain, we may see the neighbouring peaks above the clouds; they seem to be swinging in space, yet we know they are broad-based in the earth. Our lives too, separate, individual, isolated, are all grounded in the life of the one God. The universality of his Spirit in the hearts of men is the secret of the brotherhood of the race. No human being is cut off from us, because no human being is separate from Him. Thus it is that the authority of the soul is not private; its witness is not singular, and conscience is not individual. Deep as the fact of personality is—and whatever we may be we all feel we were made to count for something—the fact of mankind is deeper still. Our unity holds a vaster and more important secret than our diversity. Our common spiritual consciousness contains what is vital and necessary to faith. God has made us all one to dwell on the face of the earth.

What are the results of this method of looking with open eyes into the Holy of Holies, and investigating, examining, and deciding by the standards God has set up in the soul? It is possible now to touch briefly on only a few subjects.

Firstly, God. Discovering from the emotions and thoughts we have as we behold the starry heavens above us, and from the intuitions of the moral law within us, that God is transcendent, we are nevertheless unable to make the division between him and ourselves altogether distinct. The old theologians laid the emphasis on the conjunctions when they referred to God and man; they set divinity over against humanity and regarded the one as all holy, and the other as all unholy. We, on the other hand, remember there is divinity in man and humanity in God, and that the two sometimes blend and become indistinguishable. As with open vision we gaze deeply into our spiritual being, we find the soul has no terminus. Far away beyond my own conscious being, beyond thought, beyond conscience, I see my life is stretching on until it is lost in the life of the infinite God. My being is continuous with his, and nowhere can I say, "Here my soul has an end and here the life of God begins for me." God is the deep below my deep. He is intimate, close, immediate, and ever within call. At the same time he is the Ultimate towards whom we are all moving. Thus, what is best in us is simply the welling up of his life. Our hopes, our ideals, and our aspirations are the movements of his Spirit within us.

Unitarianism teaches, then, that man in his deepest nature is the companion of God, and that through the long ages He has gradually been coming to the realisation of this relationship. Yet orthodox scholars of philosophical ability have endeavoured to show that Unitarianism makes a gulf between man and God which can only be bridged by their conception of the Trinity, and on this ground assert that the victory of Athanasius at Nicæa was the salvation of Christianity. What I have already said shows how that gulf is non-existent. If it is still claimed that the doctrine of the Incarnation spans an abyss which would for ever yawn between the human and the divine, it must not be overlooked that it unites them at only one point, and it must also be borne in mind that the sacramental theory of grace makes clear the cleavage between them, while the theory of the Atonement sets them in direct opposition. Our objection to-day to the doctrine of the Virgin Birth is not so much on account of the physical and scriptural difficulties with which it is beset, as on account of the implication that we, owing to hereditary taint, are not truly the children of God, but, being conceived in sin and shapen in iniquity, are the offspring of some evil power, which is now left undefined.

Secondly, Jesus. He taught us and showed us that religion and true greatness are to be found, not in the acquisition of abilities and powers which separate us from those around us, but in the development of those deep inner forces which unite men everywhere as brothers and prove their kinship to the one God and Father of us all. In him we see not the fulness and glory of the Godhead, but the splendour and nobility of manhood.

See how this divine, universal principle in human nature seizes on just those elements in the old faiths which are valuable for life, and creates for us a message which not only gives this Association the right to be, but renders its existence necessary. It goes down to the very source of all doctrinal power and takes hold on those elements of truth in old dogmas which rendered them acceptable. It shows how the salvation of man is not dependent upon an external arrangement or a judicial transaction, but upon inner pent-up spiritual forces which a trifling thing may release. A kind word, the death of a friend, a noble act of sacrifice may set them at liberty so that they sweep through the life with overwhelming rush, giving it new direction and cleansing it from sin and evil desire. Is it not God's original endowment in the soul of man that is the psychological explanation of the victories of the cross? Further, sin is not due to an ancient "fall," but to the victory of what is worst in us over what is best in us. To win deliverance from its power is redemption; to be aware that God is fighting on our side is the nascent sense of forgiveness. Our belief in Immortality finds its support not in a bodily resurrection, but in the inherent worth of human nature, which is built on a larger scale than threescore years and ten. Apostolical succession is discovered not in an external order of officials, but in the line of those faithful souls, ministers and laymen, in many churches, who have yielded to the control and answered to the call of God; and every visible good becomes sacramental, the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual presence. This spiritual nature provides the only basis for a free church, for the "open trust" principle, because in so far as a church declares it has an external commission from God to man, freedom becomes impossible. It gives the greatest possible liberty to the aspiring spirit; hence the remarkable contributions of Unitarians to devotional literature and sacred song. When it binds men together in fellowship, in church life, it says to each and to all not only "you have something necessary to receive," but also "you have something necessary to give." It keeps pace with all the advances in science, art, philosophy, and human achievement, and does not hinder the higher development of any man or movement. It makes the ethical note ring loud and clear, awakening both the private and the public conscience, as the great practical and social work of our forerunners show.

Most important of all, this message which we term Unitarianism gives us the stimulus we need for human life of every description. It regards religion not as a traditional gift, a legacy from the past, but a living reality and inspiration to-day.

It says the gifts of grace are not confined to religion unless religion be considered as vast as life, and as infinite as the universe, but are the motive power of every effort for the progress of the community and the uplifting of the individual. The Divine Love acknowledges no limits. It is the Life of Ages, richly poured.

Breathing in the thinker's creed,
Pulsing in the hero's blood,
Nerving simplest thought and deed,
Freshening time with truth and good.

Consecrating art and song,
Holy book and pilgrim track,
Hurling floods of tyrant wrong
From the sacred limits back.

This is the essence of religion—this spirit which we see working through history—the life of every reformer, and the inspiration of every upward endeavour, whether it appear in the words of the preacher, on the canvas of the artist, in the discovery of the scientist, or anywhere else.

Though others may find all they need in the old ways, yet ours it is, who have won our liberty, to move forward, believing that truth is progressive and the life of the ages continuous in its unfolding. Before our eyes we may see, if we will only look, a world which is diviner and nobler than our present one, a kingdom of God that is yet to be, where service is more ready, love more powerful, and truth stands arrayed in more beautiful forms. But the spirit that animates the whole will be the same as that which spoke in the prophets and lived in the man of Nazareth. It will be that life which we in the West have been accustomed to term Christian, though it may have received other names elsewhere—simple, human life, not ecclesiastical life. All that can abide in its light will endure; and all that cannot bear the glory of its rays will shrink and pass away. "History," as Dr. Percy Gardner says, "will furnish a test of the comparative goodness of ideas." Our lengthening experience will show what doctrines, what institutions and what modes of living are in accord with the religion of our divine humanity; and we must learn something from the patience of God, who is merciful and long-suffering towards our slow toiling and poor progress.

The way is open for further development, and if we take hold on what we already possess, we shall become a missionary people, earnest to impart to others the word which has been effective and helpful in ourselves and anxious to remove every veil which hides the Father in heaven from his children on earth. Through the very nature of our religion, through its intense inwardness, it cannot be hereditary. If a man accepts it, he does so through his personal conviction. At the same time, we must do everything in our power to make clear to our children first of all that the search for truth must be earnest as well as free, and that conclusions sincerely reached must be firmly held. This is our chief duty to those who have the largest claim on our love. And our faith should take such a hold upon us that we should be able to say to those who would silence us the words of the prophet Jeremiah: "If I say I will make no more mention of the name of the Lord, nor any more speak in his name, then there is in my heart as it were a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I am weary with forbearing and I cannot contain." If we are faithful, the Spirit of Truth will come and guide us into all truth.

Whoso has felt the Spirit of the Highest Cannot confound nor doubt him—nor deny;
Yea, with one voice, O world, tho' thou deniest,
Stand thou on that side, for on this am I.

THE FOUNDATION OF TRUTH.

BY THE REV. J. CYRIL FLOWER.

TRUTH may be described as that at which all reason aims. It is the ideal of a right interpretation of experience. Fact in itself is not truth, for truth is a meaning, an intellectual valuation. Let me illustrate this. Essex Hall is in Essex-street. No one would say that the building itself is truth, or true; it simply is. But directly any person makes the statement that there is or is not such a hall in such a place, his judgment is true or false. Truth here consists in the right relation between idea and fact. In regard to matters that can be tested by methods of observation, which are amenable to sense experience, truth is the ideal of science, and the completion of science would be the establishment of truth in regard to all matters of sense experience. But even that does not enable us easily to declare what is the foundation of truth. Philosophers have carried on an agelong conflict upon this very question. One set of thinkers tell us that the external world of fact is the foundation of truth; that all we have to do is to empty our minds of wrong ideas and prejudices, and let things make their impression upon us, and in the mental reflection thereof we shall attain truth. According to this teaching, the mind is like a vast looking-glass, and truth is attained when the looking-glass is freed from all blemishes which distort the reflection, and when it is so adjusted that it reflects all possible objects.

On the other hand, there are thinkers who point out that this does not explain the actual facts of the attainment of knowledge; that in order to know, the mind has to be active, it has to connect its images and ideas of experience together by such principles as those of causation and reciprocity. In a word, the human mind has to act upon the data of experience and to mould and arrange them before they can become elements of knowledge. Truth, therefore, is at least as much dependent upon the constitution of the mind itself as upon a supposed external order of things.

If there is uncertainty as to what is the foundation of truth in matters of scientific inquiry, where experience can be tested by observation and experiment, it is not remarkable that there should also be wide divergences of opinion as to the foundation of truth in matters of moral and spiritual concern. The stars and their movements can be actually observed, and the observations of different people can be compared and checked. If yet it cannot be demonstrated at once whether the foundation of truth in astronomy is in the actual independent existence of the stars, or is at least equally inherent in the relating activity of the mind which systematises the movements into laws, clearly it is likely to be still more difficult to determine what is the basis of truth in regard to God, the moral ideal, the ultimate beauty, and so forth. For here you have many inquirers, each giving expression to the interpretation of an inner spiritual experience which, in large measure, is peculiar to the experient, and in regard to which there seems to be no clear objective standard by which to distinguish the false from the true. If I find a picture beautiful and stimulating and you do not, there is nothing more to be said. Who can say on any objective authority that the picture is or is not in itself beautiful? If I declare that my experience of a spiritual order brings me into real fellowship and union with a Power I call God, and your experience does not do this for you, what more can be said? For beauty is an immediate perception of the soul, and God is the immediate experience of the soul; there is not beauty for any person which does not issue from within—no God for any soul that is not the felt meaning of an inward experience.

Yet all will agree that the faithful interpretation of actual experience is, so far forth, truth. But you see the difficulty in which this involves us. What is truth for me is not necessarily Truth for you, and this conflicts with the radical demand of our rational nature that truth is one and objective. We cannot long remain satisfied with any doctrine that effectively encloses us in the stuffy atmosphere of subjectivism. The Pragmatic test of truth is popular temporarily simply because we are in the throes of a new enlightenment, similar to that which was heralded in Greek history by the Sophistic movement. Pragmatism is a modern form of Sophisticism (to be carefully distinguished from what we call "sophistry"). It has been undoubtedly a recognition of the claims of the truth impulse which has led to the various attempts to construct artificial objective foundations for religious truth in the course of religious history. The foundation of truth, said the Christian Church, is not in your individual experience and interpretation; it is in the Bible as interpreted by tradition, together with the exposition of the duly appointed ecclesiastical trustees of this divine revelation. If your experience does not harmonise with this, you must be duly coerced until it does, either by the force of physical pain or spiritual torment.

The Reformation indicated an important step forward towards the fuller recognition of personality and personal experience in relation to truth; but the full force of the Reformation has yet to be felt. True, its immediate effect was to enthrone the Bible upon the pedestal of authority, to place it more dogmatically than ever as the foundation of truth; but it was the Bible as interpreted not by an infallible church, but by an infallible Spirit, whose dwelling place was not determined by the laying on of hands, but by individual purity of heart. The earnest, humble, and pure-hearted would find the Bible the foundation of all religious truth without the mediation of any priest or system, because his heart and the sacred page would be illumined by the Holy Spirit. To this profound doctrine we shall refer again. What has happened in the years since the Reformation has been so clear a demonstration that not the Bible, but an interpretation of it, must be the foundation of religious truth, that we are brought to the issue that personal experience is even here actually by far the most important basis of truth. To ensure the stability of the Bible as the sole foundation, you need the infallible church; for under the guidance of the Spirit interpretations are as various as the Spirit is free.

The logical and moral outcome of this is the Unitarian movement, with its full and free recognition of diversities of opinion among earnest seekers after truth, diversities which can co-exist with a true unity of spirit. This is a recognition that every person's experience must be the foundation of that superstructure of interpretation which becomes his opinion, creed or philosophy, but at the same time an emphatic recognition of the fact that none of these relative structures are the whole truth. Rather, every individual's construction is by itself but a fragment, which must find its appropriate place in the Heavenly or Ideal City of Truth. We are convinced that in the fellowship and co-operation of many whose experience adapts them for different perceptions and interpretations will the fuller harmony of Truth itself emerge. Instead, therefore, of requiring agreement on some external foundation of truth as a condition of admission to fellowship, we ask that those who unite with us shall find their own foundation within, always remembering that it is not the whole foundation.

Every person who is intellectually and morally sincere is adapted to perceive some aspect of truth, but none probably to perceive the whole. It is the recognition of this which is the substantial and enduring basis of church fellowship. I spoke just now of the profound doctrine at the heart of the Reformation concerning the illumination of the Holy Spirit. What that means, in modern language, is that the construction of the Ideal City of Truth is not the work of the individual toiling in loneliness, but is a task which can indeed only be undertaken by those whose individual experience is impinged upon and illumined by a greater spirit—a spirit in virtue of which we recognise the unity of our aims in spite of, or indeed by means of, the diversities of our experience and opinion. That greater spirit we know by its operation within us as the impulse for truth—that which makes us eager after truth for truth's sake. It is our possession by, and grasp of, this spirit which makes it at once possible and necessary for us to seek in the fellowship of other inquirers the correction and expansion of our own particular opinions; for we want above all not to justify or establish our own interpretation, but to contribute our fragment to the foundation of that great City of Truth which will include and transcend all our partial views. The essential thing for those who would discover the veritable foundation of truth is not an overweening confidence in the infallibility of their own opinion, or in the completeness of their own experience, but such a disposition towards the ideal of truth as shall make them ready to acknowledge their own insufficiency, and seek to correct it by whole-hearted co-operation with all others who are genuine seekers.

Practically the outcome of it all, as I see it, is that the foundation of truth for religion is to be found in personal experience widened, deepened and illumined by the impulse of an unhesitating disposition towards truth, and tested and corrected by a vital fellowship with other seekers—a fellowship made concrete in the home and in the church and rising to inspiration in the sacred intimacies of friendship and love. But, as in the determination of the foundation of truth in science, it is not mere numbers that constitute the test, but the collaboration of those, few or many, who have the impulse towards truth for truth's sake, so it is in the determination of religious truth. It is not the numbers of those who form the fellowship, but it is the reality of that unity of spirit among them which constrains them to reach out after a richer and fuller harmony than they can produce from the keyboard of their individual experience.

The mischief of the intellect and of the will is when it would be anything merely of itself—so Emerson declares. At any rate, we may safely say that self-sufficiency is the foundation of a great part of error and falsehood. Personal experience can only be the foundation of truth when it is irradiated by that Spirit which Hindu thought recognised in the Universal Self, Christian experience has denominated the Holy Spirit, Emerson has proclaimed as the Oversoul. And that Spirit is concrete and operative in the men and women who are earnest seekers after and lovers of the truth. Therefore, I say, the foundation of truth is in the fellowship of such people. The church, if you like, is the foundation, or ought to be; for there we can merge our individual life and experience in a larger life and experience, and lifted out of the limitations of selfhood with its prejudices and half-views, we can behold our personal opinions and interpretations falling into place, often through apparent discord, into a vast and grand harmony.

CHURCH MUSIC.

THE importance of musical art to public worship can hardly be overstated. The often thrilling beauty of a cathedral service almost entirely depends on an adequate rendering of the music. The value of a free service in a Nonconformist chapel is largely due to the heartiness and fulness of congregational singing. Music, the language of the emotions, has an influence which no one can explain, but no one will deny. The wedding of noble music to golden words has been celebrated often, and in nothing does their union produce a more moving result than in the oratorio, cantata, anthem, and hymn. It is easy to think of cases in which the words gain mainly in appeal and power to touch the heart by their musical setting. Compare the effect of the words "I know that my Redeemer liveth" when only spoken with the same words sung to Handel's music. Or read the words of the Kyrie, Benedictus, Gloria and Sanctus, and then listen to Bach's use of them in his B minor Mass. Many of the hymns that are most dear to us owe much of their charm and impressiveness to the musician who has given them fitting expression.

Church music is of two kinds; one, and the most important, for the congregation, and one for the choir. Hymn, chant and response are for the congregation; anthem, cantata and introit are for the choir. For there is a grace of listening as well as of "joining in." The plain hymn tune that anybody can sing is good, and nobody can hear such a tune as "Aurelia" sung by a great congregation at a Church Conference without an almost overwhelming emotion. But music that no one can sing save a trained vocalist may also be good; music that only a skilled musician can render may also fall as a benediction on the heart. Only, the skill and training must be there, for a solo or an anthem badly sung irritates and stirs up a range of feeling that is not at all worshipful.

Our Free Churches are mostly concerned with music for the congregation. In non-liturgical churches the hymn and chant are the only opportunity the congregation has of giving audible expression to its devotion. And it is not enough that hymn and psalm should be read. The difference between reading and singing, writes Mr. Stewart,* may be compared to that between an engraving and a painting. Both represent the same subject, but there is a warmth of feeling about the painting that is not in the engraving. So it is with praise. What colour does for the picture, music does for worship. And in the hymn the colours are heightened and the feeling deepened by the participation of the whole congregation. Listen to such tunes as the Old Hundredth or St. Anne, sung by the choir alone, and then sung by a great assembly. The choir rendering may be more delicate and musical, but it is thin and cold compared with the full, massive, and stately effect produced by the co-operation of every worshipper.

Mr. Stewart's little book on music in the church is written from the point of view of the Scottish churches and their needs. Therefore in some respects it does not apply to our English churches, which know not the metrical version of the Psalms so dear to Scotchmen. Nevertheless, there is much in it of value for all churches where congregational singing is an essential element. It is indeed an excellent little book, and might be studied with advantage by every minister, every organist, and every choirmaster. The historical section is admirably done, and gives a very clear view of the use and development of church music in Christendom. The practical section deals with the choice of hymns and tunes, the functions of choir and organ, and the mistakes to be avoided in anthems and voluntaries, and many incidental matters. So far as the organ is concerned, the conditions of organ playing in the majority of Free Churches of every denomination is deplorable. They are largely dependent on amateurs who, because they can play the piano, are pressed into the organ-gallery to play on an instrument which requires, at the least, a large amount of technical skill quite different from the requirements of the piano, to say nothing of such qualities as right feeling, good taste and poetical interpretation. Even professional organists of the second class are often guilty of shocking bad taste in their accompaniments and voluntaries. The really great organists of our cathedrals never accompany a tune with florid variations on a solo stop, never play the tenor part an octave higher than the soprano, never indulge in trills and runs while "Melcombe" is being sung, never plaster the expression as with a whitewash brush, never rush the tune at a speed the congregation cannot follow, never spoil a German chorale by taking it at the same pace as a tune by a modern musician. We shall not get better congregational singing until we get better organ playing.

In one respect we find ourselves at variance with Mr. Stewart. Considering the absence of musical training in most congregations, he is in favour of the old ecclesiastical Plain Song tunes, given in unison by the congregation, on the ground that the congregation is not a great choir in which the several parts are adequately represented, and which may be expected to give a fairly good rendering of the harmony set before it. He quotes with approval Henry Smart's account of the manner in which he dealt with congregational singing when appointed to St. Pancras Church. The vicar and he discussed the kind of music they were to aim at, and came to the conclusion that the proper way of treating the congregation is the way of the German and the Dutch—to make them sing in unison, or in octaves, which is musically the same thing. The part of the organ was to vary the harmonies of each verse, according to the verbal expression, keeping them ecclesiastical in style. But those who remember the singing at St. Pancras under Henry Smart do not speak of the success of that experiment, but of its heaviness and monotony. It needed the genius of a Henry Smart to make the organ an efficient interpreter of the mood and feeling of the hymn, and a Henry Smart is not found at every key-board. Nor are English congregations quite so destitute of musical skill as are the Scotch—according to Mr. Stewart. In a well-known London chapel (Congregational) the Hallelujah chorus from the "Messiah" might be heard on special occasions sung by the whole congregation, and with excellent effect. Unisonian singing would be, for the most part, a step backward in English churches. It was a great movement forward when the Church of England, in "Hymns Ancient and Modern," first printed the tune with every hymn. All denominations have since followed that lead, with the result of that considerable improvement in congregational singing we have witnessed during the last sixty years. J. W.

THE HUMAN AND THE DIVINE.

SIR,—I will not pretend to interpret Mr. Donald Fraser's mind on the subject of the God whom he declares himself to be, but I should be glad to explain my own position a little more fully, if I may.

My whole contention was that we as living beings, with individual, personal experience, with spiritual perceptions and powers, are not separate and isolated in the realm of existence, but that our life rests in God. We live in an ordered universe, and in so far as we are active and intelligent animals, we have our place as part of the material world. But we are not that world, and it would be a simple absurdity, and a plain misuse of words, for any one of the creatures on the earth to get up and say that he was. And so with regard to the deeper realities of our life, in which we have a higher kinship than that of the material world.

The Absolute, we say, is of necessity the ground of our being, as of all else that is, because that is what we come to in the ultimate analysis of thought. But the Absolute is one, and we are many, and we are not that from which we derive our being. This is the mystery of our life, which we cannot fathom, simply because we are not God, we are not ourselves the Infinite and Eternal; but we can lift up our thoughts and our hearts to God, and we can accept the mystery as an inevitable condition of our life. And here, in the realm of the spiritual life, religion comes in. For we are dependent beings, and our joy and strength is to know in whom we trust. God is "the Home of souls," and we cannot go where he is not. It is not a question of time or space, or of the material conditions of our life in any form, but of the reality of personal relations and conviction of the spirit.

It is perfectly true that there can be nothing outside the Absolute, if "outside" has any meaning in that connection; and certainly it is true that there is nothing in us, of all the powers we possess, that is not of God, for he gives us all we have, and in him we live and move and have our being. But if we live in him, we are not He. "Our wills are ours, to make them thine." "The Spirit bears witness with our spirit, that we are children of God." That I take to be the vital truth of religion. God is the deepest reality of our life, because he is the Giver and Sustainer, and in him is our rest. His appeal comes to us as "the Power, not ourselves, that makes for righteousness" in his world, and we have set before us the ideal of the Kingdom of God. His light enlightens, and with growing clearness opens to us truth and the way of service. In his strength we are strong, through the steadfastness of our obedience. It is his love, the greatest of all, which makes the blessedness of our life.

* Music in the Church. By the Rev. G. Wauchope Stewart, B.D. Guild Library. London: A. & C. Black. 1s. 6d.

It is the fellowship of life and communion of the spirit into which we are called, with him, our Father, and with one another. It is a mystery, and yet it is the simple truth; and surely he to whom we look as chief of faithful souls had true discernment when he said that only as little children can we enter the kingdom of God.

If Mr. Fraser ask me to acknowledge that, in speaking thus of our life in God, I might just as well, and better for the sake of brevity, make his declaration, "I am God," I can only say that so far as I have any grasp of the spiritual reality of life, clear self-knowledge, humility and reverence alike cry out against it. But if he simply means by that, "I am of divine kinship, a child of God," then it would be better that he should say so, and refrain from a palpable misuse of the great Name of God.

Anyone who is puzzled by Mr. Fraser's statement that in the Hibbert article on "Divine Immanence" from which I quoted Professor Henry Jones "puts me in one place and God in another," will do well to read the article in question.

Mr. Fraser seems doubtful as to my identity, so as I do not like to be credited with graces I do not possess, I had better tell him that before he came to Pembroke Chapel I was for some years in Liverpool, the inconspicuous minister of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.—Yours, &c.,

SPIRITUAL HEALING.

SIR,—In an article on "Spiritual Healing," of May 9, you say that medical science is more wonderful than miraculous cures can be. I suppose THE INQUIRER stands for a spiritual conception of the Universe—that spirit is the Reality behind all phenomena; but when we come to act upon this theory we are told it is dragging Christian faith into an atmosphere of miracle that is not conducive to real religion.

But miracle is only the exceptional. When the laws of Nature or of God are better understood, and more people act in accordance with them, these miracles that shock so many will have nothing irregular about them, and will fall into place with other scientific facts in the order of the world. You consent to acknowledge a mental factor in healing. Even orthodox physicians are willing to allow much to suggestion, but a step higher to spiritual cure is pronounced superstition. I can understand opposition from the orthodox, who say "the age of miracles is past," but Unitarians have always maintained that God is as much in the world to-day as in the first century, and I suppose the cures of Christ and his Apostles may still be accepted as historical. I cannot see why it is less honouring to God and "real religion" to be cured by faith in the divine principle within than by medicine, especially by serums which are obtained by cruelty to God's creatures. It is no good putting up a notice, "Défense à Dieu; De faire miracle en ce lieu." The miracles will happen all the same.—Yours, &c.,

THE MYSTERY OF FORGETFULNESS.

The Psycho-pathology of Every-day Life. By Professor Sigmund Freud, LL.D. Authorised translation by A. A. Brill, M.D. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 1914.

Most people know the experience of suddenly, and for a time totally forgetting something which, as a rule, is perfectly familiar and well known to them. It is not here a question of what we usually designate "bad memory," the persistent failure to retain ideas, either generally or in particular cases; we are referring to another sort of forgetfulness—spasmodic, temporary, sudden in its onslaught, which may cause us to pull up short at a loss in what we are saying, or to use a wrong word when we really know the right one, or which may lead us to make mistakes and errors in action seemingly, at the moment, wholly unexpected and quite inexplicable. "What an astonishing thing," we hear a man say, "I've totally forgotten his name," or that word, or the name of that place, "though I really know it so well." Or we do something, as we say, inadvertently, without premeditation, try to open the door of our office with the key that really belongs to our house, inexplicably knock over and break an ornament in our drawing room, stumble over a familiar door-step, lose or misplace some trinket or other, and so on, throughout a multitude of little actions and happenings which we usually set down as "accidents" due to momentary forgetfulness.

This is the kind of forgetfulness that crops up in practically everybody's life at some time or other, and invariably creates astonishment and perplexity. Take the common case of suddenly forgetting the run of a perfectly familiar quotation. We have heard of a man who could never remember the Lord's Prayer beyond a certain point, and dared not recite it in public unless he had it, printed or written, before his eyes. How frequently, again, do we forget familiar names of persons, places, streets. There is a case—not an unusual one—of a man who wished to introduce a friend to his wife, but could not remember his friend's name, though he was utterly familiar with it—the man and his friend were, in fact, called by precisely the same name. There is in Wales a certain group of small lakes perfectly well known to the present writer, yet, nine times out of ten, he is totally unable to recall the name of those lakes. There's a sort of uncanny fatality about it; the name is there, quite familiar, recognised and known as soon as heard, but just when it is wanted and tries to rise to the surface of consciousness, forgetfulness seizes it in mysterious grasp, and drags it back into the abyss.

Now, why is this? Is there any scientific explanation for these and similar facts? Or have we gone as far as we can when we ascribe them all to chance and accident, and unaccountable "lapses of memory"? For most psychologists the study of a negative thing like forgetfulness does not seem to offer a promising field, but Professor Sigmund Freud, whose name has in recent years attained some prominence, is either more confident or more adventurous than his fellows. He has now offered the public a theory of forgetfulness which, though interesting enough, can hardly be described as pleasing and acceptable. But then, as has been said, truth may be eminently distasteful and disagreeable to us. As to the ultimate truth of Freud's theory experts must finally decide, and doubtless they will dispute, as experts do; personally we think that, whilst there are elements of truth in the Freudian hypothesis, Freud has become obsessed by it beyond all reasonable limits, and let himself be drawn into conclusions quite unwarranted even by his own theory. In another book, "The Interpretation of Dreams," Freud developed the view that all dreams have a definite cause and ground in the mental contents of the dreamer, and that this cause and ground can be invariably discovered by analysing the contents, conscious, marginal, and subconscious, of the mind of the dreamer. The cause of dreams is generally the activity of some psychic complex which in waking hours is repressed, kept under, by more desirable, more satisfying contents of consciousness, but which, not being wholly subdued or eradicated, takes its revenge by breaking out wildly in dreams. There is something in your experience you would rather not think about, something unpleasant; down it goes into the recesses of consciousness, into the region of suppressed ideas, when, of course, the mysterious mechanism of the nervous system records and keeps it alive, unknown to you. You sleep, and these unruly members of the psychic whole get their innings; they rush to the surface, dragging along with them all kinds of associations, and occupy your consciousness as dreams. Obviously a plausible theory enough, but rather spoilt by Freud's tendency to regard every suppressed psychic complex as sexual in tone and character, and the consequent implication that the reservoir of our subconscious self is decidedly thick and muddy.

However, practically the same theory is applied to forgetfulness. There is, apparently, no such thing as forgetfulness at all. What we call instances of forgetfulness are really instances of the activity of some suppressed psychic complex making itself felt in this way, and at this time. There is a vast deal more going on in our minds than most of us suppose, and what we call our moments of forgetfulness are the opportunities for despised members of our mental make up to have their say. We forget a name—why? Because that name has been seized by or got itself associated with some psychic complex which we, for some reason or other, have driven, or allowed to sink, below the margin of consciousness; it has become affixed to something we don't want to remember, and the associating mechanism of the brain won't let it escape. Freud claims that all these inhibitive and active complexes can be discovered by analysis, by working backward through chains and links of association till you reach the offender who is really responsible for your forgetfulness. Let us return to the Welsh Lakes for a moment. Why cannot I, the present writer, remember the names of those lakes? Because, says Freud, the name has become somehow associated with a psychic complex whose proper home is my subconscious self, whither it has been relegated because I would rather not remember it. I have tried several times by psycho-analysis to discover what this unpleasant content of my subconscious self is, but so far I have failed. Freud gives hosts of cases in his book, and analyses many, and anyone who desires to see the methods and the results should get hold of the book. The old tendency towards the sexual reappears here; but we are really not prepared to believe that the subconscious self of the mass of mankind is so packed with sexuality as Freud would make out.

Freud's general conclusion is that "certain inadequacies of our psychic capacities, and certain performances which are apparently unintentional prove to be well motivated when subjected to the psycho-analytic investigation, and are determined through the consciousness of unknown motives." On the basis of this Freud builds up and elaborates the view that our mental life is completely determined from first to last in every detail of it; that what we intend, and what we do not intend, in word and action, is fatally necessitated by our psychic mechanism, over which we have no control whatever. Free will, psychological, at any rate, is an utter delusion; all that goes on in mind is mechanically determined. We will leave Professor Freud to the free will enthusiasts, and only remark that it is one thing to display and describe the intricate mechanism of the mental life, and to show that mechanism at work in strange and rather startling ways, but it is quite another and totally different thing to say that mechanism is all and consciousness nothing, and the one thing does not follow from the other. To suppose that mechanism and life are to be equated simply for the asking is the pet fallacy of all scientific philosophy.

THE SPIRIT OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Restatement and Reunion. A Study in First Principles. By H. Streeter. London: Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d. net.

THOSE who want to read a lucid and deeply religious statement of the Broad Church position cannot do better than turn to this short volume of essays by the editor of "Foundations." Mr. Streeter cannot, of course, avoid some reference to present controversies, but his chief aim is to present a positive religious position and to suggest the wide range of spiritual loyalties which have to be considered before a minister quits the Church at the bidding of those who are less advanced in modernism than himself. To some minds the question of conformity reduces itself to a simple logical dilemma, either-or; and there is no middle course. To others the intellectual question can never present itself in isolation, and whether we agree with the position or not we must try to envisage the whole problem from their point of view. It is as a real help to doing this that we have found Mr. Streeter's essay "What does the Church of England stand for?" most enlightening. It is not only an extremely able statement inspired by large tolerance and breadth of view; it is alive with the passionate loyalties of his own life. Anglicanism in his view stands in the first place not for a political compromise or a special theology, but for a type of Christian spirit. Other communities, he grants, have their special characteristics which are needed for a complete Christianity, but the Church of England has preserved in a special degree the tradition of comprehensiveness, sound learning and moderation. It has little tendency to create the extremist either of the Roman or the Puritan pattern, but its spirit of balance and moderation is not a colourless intermediate term between the two. It is a positive contribution to the fulness of Christ. "The Anglican spirit," Mr. Streeter writes, "has not produced conspicuous examples of the whole range of Christian character; it has produced a wide range, and many of these of a type which could hardly have been produced elsewhere. It is a spirit, therefore, which is worthy of surviving, and one which it should be our aim to strengthen and develop along its own lines."

Here it will be seen is the foundation of Mr. Streeter's liberalism towards other modes of thought and worship, for their need is recognised; but it is also the source of his own loyalty to a communion which not only satisfies his personal need but also asks for his devoted help, lest it should be turned aside from its true aim by false partizanship or a passing fashion of exclusiveness. It also determines his attitude towards the problem of reunion and the conception of the one Church. Here he dismisses the idea of sovereignty and looks forward to an alliance based upon mutual sympathy and understanding. "When once all Christians have realised the fact, and faced all the implications of the fact, that one essential difference of the Church and the State is, that in no circumstances can a United Church coerce minorities, and that the powers of any central authority must consist in moral prestige, not in the right of compulsion, the problem of reunion will take on a new phase." Perhaps this is as far as we can go at the present moment in the direction of a policy of inclusion, but here is the temper which the Broad Churchmen in all the churches must endeavour to exhibit in their own lives and to develop in its manifold practical applications to the utmost of their power.

CHITRA. By Rabindranath Tagore. London: Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d. net.

WHEN we saw Mr. Tagore's play, "The Post Office" on the stage, acted with singular charm by the Irish players, we were impressed by its fragile beauty; but we doubted whether it would bear transference to the printed page. "Chitra," which we have not seen acted, seems to justify this fear. It contains some beautiful writing, but it is without a touch of dramatic power. The simple legend, which the Greek genius might have transformed into something rich and strange, gains nothing from being told in character. We should have preferred it as a primitive tale without any theatrical artifice. A prefatory note informs us that it was written twenty-five years ago. We hope that Mr. Tagore will not allow his present popularity in this country to be the occasion for the publication of slight and inferior work. We shall not easily forgive him if he does anything to dull the first joyous impression of "Git-anjali."

PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM. By the Rev. D. C. Simpson, M.A. Introduction by the Rt. Rev. H. E. Ryle, D.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton.

READERS of the Old Testament unable for any reason to study the well-known "Introduction to the Old Testament" by the late Dr. Driver, will find much in this volume of interest and value. Dr. Driver, who had seen it in manuscript, described it as "a lucid and helpful outline of the principles, history, and chief results of the higher criticism of the Pentateuch, with an answer to some objections which have been recently brought against it." Dr. Ryle quotes these words in an introduction, which, at Dr. Driver's request, he writes in his stead. No better commendation of the book can be given. In view of the purpose which "Pentateuchal Criticism" is intended to serve, perhaps the title is a little unfortunate. Those who cannot appreciate a more complete treatment of the subject will not be attracted by it; and, on the other hand, others will look in vain for an exhaustive review of the development of criticism, since the history of criticism is contained in a single chapter. The opening chapter on "The Meaning of Criticism" is excellent, and brings out clearly "the essential nature of criticism, namely, calm, judicial, impartial discrimination." The analysis of the Pentateuch which follows proceeds on lines approved by modern scholarship. The evidence for it is shown to be cumulative, and based upon the different vocabularies, religious conceptions, and ceremonial requirements found in the constituent documents. The repetitions, inconsistencies, incoherences, and flagrant contradictions which perplex the intelligent reader of the Pentateuch are explained as the work of different writers, or schools of writers, and the hands of the later editors are disclosed. Thus the evolution of religious ideas in the Old Testament is revealed. The last chapter on "The Divine Purpose in Hebrew Religion" displays the Old Testament as a "scheme of preparation for the Incarnation," an interpretation of the Hebrew sacred literature even attributed to Jesus himself. The Reader in Old Testament in Manchester College, Oxford, is to be heartily congratulated on the publication of a scholarly discussion of Pentateuchal criticism.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

BIRDS' BASKETS.

No man knows what an artless host of screeching harpies the feathered flocks were before they had discovered the joy and sweetness of singing or learnt the craft of home-building. But when, one spring-time, the Spirit of the Nest came and called them, they flew to her feet and fed on her bounty.

"Sweet children," said the gentle Spirit of the Nest, "ye are happy; ye shall be happier still."

Gathering a handful of dry grasses, she turned and wove them deftly with her fingers, and made many neat small baskets which she hung in the bushes, or lodged in mossy crannies amongst the roots of the trees. A party of birds followed her, hopping along the ground, turning their bright eyes up to her face in timid and silent wonder. Now and again one would venture to fly up on to her wrist or shoulder and watch her pretty constructions.

"Now," said the Spirit of the Nest, at last, "see, dear Birds, if you, too, can make baskets like these, and hang them up in hedge or tree wheresoever you will." The birds fairly laughed with delight at this proposal, and were off in a trice in every direction, in pairs, so as to help one another. They gathered straws and grasses, small sticks and dead leaves, and set to work at basket-making with a will. The chaffinches worked in fragments of moss and lichen. The tom-tits hunted for feathers to make a silky soft lining, while the thrushes lined theirs with a cup of clay. The tiny goldcrests carried their gleanings of moss up into a fir-tree and cleverly wove them together with threads of cobweb. Some rooks, flying down to see what was a-doing, fell in with the business forthwith, but decided to work on their own device. They gathered sticks and broke twigs from the trees; then, high in the forks of the topmost branches, they laid and bent the spars until they, too, had made a big rough sort of market-basket. A pair of seagulls, flying inland for worms, thought that they would also join the basket-makers when they got back to their haunts among the rocks. But they made a sorry hand at it, for the only material they could find was seaweed, with which they could make nothing better than a sort of rough and tumble mat. So, from one to another, the new art spread, until almost all the birds in the world had learnt to make some sort of basket. Many were constructed with exquisite skill, while others were very rude and simple. Nevertheless, when the Spirit of the Nest went round to look at the results of their labours, though she could not help smiling at some, such as the penguins, who tried to make baskets of stones, she was pleased, and promised them all a reward for their diligence. Then, from the satchel she carried on her arm, she drew all sorts of coloured emblems and laid them in the baskets which her pupils had made—choice little curios of blue or white or rusty-speckled in the small baskets, and big, richly clouded ones in those which were larger. Even where some dull-witted fowl, failing in its attempt, could produce nothing better than a sort of saucer, which it made by sitting on the ground, the Spirit of the Nest said that she had done her best, and stooped and laid a handsome token or two in it.

"And now," said she to them all, "you must never leave your treasures, but guard them day and night, and if you are faithful still better things will happen."

Hearing this, the birds were so proud to be entrusted with such responsibilities that they arranged always to keep in pairs, so that while one sat on the basket to protect its contents, the other should collect food and sing to cheer his mate.

But a day came when something tremendous happened. Every egg in every nest was broken—for the baskets were nests, and the tokens were eggs. Yes, every single egg was broken. At this seeming disaster there was not a bird but was struck dumb with amazement; and then, before it could give vent to its grief in wild cries of distress, it began to thrill with bliss all through its body and to bubble over in low chortlings of joy as it discovered that in place of every broken egg there was a little featherless bird, scarcely awake, but yawning, and so limp and helpless and hungry that it would be glad of all the downy warmth of its mother's breast and of as many worms and spiders as she and its father could catch from dawn to dusk each day.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE PEACE CONGRESS.

FROM OUR LIVERPOOL CORRESPONDENT.

CONFRONTED by voluminous notes of speeches of which nearly every one was excellent in its way, and over against these the space allotted for their condensation in THE INQUIRER, the present writer is driven to a rough impressionism rather than a statement of details of the Peace Congress lately held in Liverpool. Attended largely by delegates whose demeanour and expression still show that curious tranquillity associated with the Society of Friends, the Congress speedily manifested itself as a society of experts in many directions, and by no means of merely amiable sentimentalists who laid themselves out to emotionalise hard political facts. It might claim to voice a part, and not an insignificant part, of the national temper which is beginning to rebel against the fixed categories of militaristic dogma, and is asking how far this answers to the facts and needs of the Empire, of the individuals composing the Empire, and of "the soul of the people." Naturally the speakers chiefly addressed those already convinced of the suicidal folly of war, but one is fain to hope that the putting of the case by commerce, by labour, and by religion, may really serve to take some hold, as reported in the Press, of the public mind.

Robert Blatchford, it is said, once listened to the complaints of an old Irishman in Kerry, and presently asked him "what it was he wanted." "The old man leaned on his spade and looked out across the black peat fields at the lowering skies. 'What is it that I'm wantun?' he said. 'All our brave bhoys and dear gurls is away an' over the says, an' the agent has taken the pig off me, an' the wet has spoiled the praties, an' I'm an owld man, an' I want the Day of Judgment!'"

"I want the Day of Judgment!" Some of us felt it in our hearts to utter the same cry amid the crowding impressions of last week: a Day of Judgment to wake us all up from our softness and supineness and insensibility to the realities in which (and upon which) we live, even as those who fared sumptuously every day were awakened by the French Revolution. Two things stood out starkly in my mind: the familiar fact of our mad expenditure on preparations for killing men—the only preventive, it is absurdly urged, of a general killing and being killed—of something like £72,000,000 a year on armaments alone; surely the maddest obsession that has ever taken a collective hold of sane men; and besides this spectacle of hallucinated governments that other fact: the fact of a state of poverty which is killing physically, mentally, morally, and spiritually a large proportion of our population. Blood and iron on one side with their demand of one hundred millions a year; and on the other, the children in the heart of the Empire crowding in single rooms, continually underfed, continually insecure, offering up to civilisation a holocaust of infants and maidens, with nothing to fear from war because they have little to hope from peace. It is literally true to say that there are many in our midst, creeping menacingly about our slums and evil tenements, who have nothing to fear from invasion; for as far as they are concerned no conceivable state can be worse than the present, and dying is better than such living, which is not living at all. The Day of Judgment? We have lost faith in it, and no longer concern ourselves with the damning witness of the recording angel. Yet as we look round on the facts of life and the world it almost seems that we are confronted again with that ominous truth: whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

"If one-tenth of the expenditure on armaments," affirmed Mr. H. E. Crawford, the Liberal candidate for Southport, "could be devoted to the campaign against tuberculosis, we should soon be nationally in a fair way of getting rid of that scourge altogether. If £10,000,000 of it could be devoted to education, and an equal amount distributed to the local authorities to destroy the slums, we should see marvellous results. The great ameliorative work which the State has undertaken is daily and hourly retarded by the vast offering we are called upon to lay on the altar of Mars." Mars or Christ! What, says "Artifex" in the Manchester Guardian, are the churches doing? This is the question of the day. If they cannot educate the public in this matter, or if their influence is on the wrong side, they stand eternally discredited. A certain note of hopelessness concerning the churches made itself heard every now and then in the Congress. The attitude of large numbers of clerics during the Boer War is not forgotten. "Have the churches declaimed Peace as they ought?" asked Dr. Laurent. "It is not the first time that the world has been a better Christian than the Church. The taunt has often been raised that religion has never helped the cause of peace. But if the Church of Christ fails to witness for peace it is not Christian doctrine but Christian practice that is at fault." "Every war between nations," said the Bishop of Liverpool, preaching to a not too large audience in the Pro-Cathedral, "is the outward and visible sign of the failure of Christianity." The part taken by the local Anglicans in the Congress was not conspicuous; the only notable Anglican contribution, as far as Liverpool was concerned, being the Bishop's sermon.

Among the most significant of all the utterances were those of the representatives of Labour. One fact stands out as certain: enlightened Labour, the world over, is solid for peace, and is the greatest factor in the creation of "the international mind." "In every country," cried Mr. Dubery, a young postman, "the workers are against the international fiends who are trying to wreck civilisation. The time will come when the railway men will refuse to move the troops, the miners will refuse to dig the coal for war engines and transport, every worker will refuse to provide the material for killing. The workers look towards the future human race, and see every nationality shouldering the burdens of the world's work in perfect amity. Now all the great brains have turned towards death-dealing appliances. If all this inventive genius had been turned to life-giving rather than death-dealing; if the millions spent on war had been spent on the arts of peace, what might not human progress have been? The people feel this," cried this eloquent young working man—and well they may. "If peace comes," said the representative of a Trades Union with 80,000 men behind him, as he said, "it will only come by the working classes. If they determine to have peace they will have peace. The Trades Unions are dissatisfied with the Peace Council; they are not denominational and are not much taken with the churches, and the peace propaganda must appeal to the working classes on the broadest possible basis—but it does not appeal often enough or strongly enough. The Council should emulate the National Service League, which sends its best men to speak to the workers and urge its case. The workers are quite able to see the fallacies in their arguments. But the peace people cannot afford to neglect the very class which in the last resort has war and peace in its hands."

It is obvious that the whole subject conspicuously engages the attention of Labour, and that the period since the Boer War has brought about an immense change in mood and point of view, as well as a great increase of class-consciousness in international Labour. The workers are increasingly aware that all their interests lie in the direction of peace, and are not blinded to the fact that when men and money are diverted from production to destruction it is they who suffer first. Militarism is the antithesis of democracy, and of civil rights and liberties. It is a matter of sadness that the democracies in Australia and New Zealand should, in spite of all this, have given themselves to conscription.

There is no space left to treat of the brilliant speeches delivered by experts from the economic point of view. Mr. Max Muspratt, speaking on "War and Trade," held that expenditure on armaments was a definite and direct loss to commerce. Mr. F. Mertens addressed the Congress on the effect of armament expenditure on wages and the price of commodities. Mr. Perris pleaded for more fighting spirit against the real enemies of peace, "the armaments-ring." A great deal of interest was taken in the Congress by many prominent Unitarians, who gave it practical help and encouragement.

MRS. BESANT AT QUEEN'S HALL. THE MAN-IDEA.

In her lecture on "The Man-Idea" on Sunday, June 7, Mrs. Besant dealt with the conceptions of man which have been presented to the world in science and religion. She drew attention specially to the science of the last century, the farthest removed from the mystical idea, because, although science is certainly going away now from the materialistic position, in which the conception of man was naturally that of an evolving body rather than an evolving soul, the larger and wider thought which is beginning to express itself through some of the leading scientists of our time is hardly yet sufficiently formulated and developed to be presented in a very intelligible way. It is somewhat in a state of flux. It is perhaps even more in philosophy that the idea of man among modern thinkers is showing a change from the materialistic to the idealistic or religious aspect. In the writings of Bergson, for instance, it is seen at once that we are going back to the thought that man is a spiritual intelligence, and not only an intellectual being. Bergson is really putting forward in philosophical garb what Theosophy has been teaching more along scientific and psychological lines.

In those days that are well within the memory of elderly people at the present time the evolution hypothesis, of course, dominated the conceptions of man, and society was figured as evolving from man in the savage state, he having himself evolved from what are spoken of as the social animals. There was the evolution from the social type of animal into primitive man, then the mating of man, the formation of the family as the first unit of the society that was to be, the aggregations of families into tribes and of tribes into nations; an idea not without its beauty and splendour as stage by stage was traced. Side by side with this we were asked to realise the evolution of morality. First there was the recognition of the family bond and the duties belonging to it, without which the general struggle for existence would have led to extinction; then the family is extended to the tribe, within the limits of which murder and theft are looked upon with disapproval, though there is no obligation in regard to members of other tribes; then we are shown the gradual growth of the nation, and we have a morality forbidding violence and murder and theft within the nation, but not as between one nation and another, which has existed up to the present time, for international morality is as yet only in the throes of birth. While we recognise that it is wrong to commit murder, and that one man cannot be allowed to kill another man, when the men are multiplied by hundreds of thousands then murder becomes war, and the murderers are warriors and heroes. Similarly in the case of theft. You may not steal a man's purse; but if you steal his land and call it conquest or annexation, that will not be inconsistent with the idea of national morality held by civilised peoples.

There is much that is logical and coherent in this conception of man's progress, but the difficulty is that it is not supported by facts, and that history, so far as it exists, does not show us these traces of the savage evolving into civilisation, of the barbarian growing into a high state of education and culture. The idea seems so natural that perhaps it is hard to realise that there is no such case known. The savages that we are familiar with are all tending to die out and disappear wherever civilisation approaches them, and we shall not find a single instance in which savages left to themselves have evolved into civilisation. This is somewhat remarkable if the scientific theory be true. The civilisations of the past have this great characteristic, that they seem to spring "fully formed," as has been said, upon the stage of history. We cannot trace their youth, their growth. We come upon them in their maturity, and dig down as far as we may we cannot dig down into the savage stage. We find cave men and men of the stone age, but no traces of their evolving from the stone age into civilisation. That gulf is never crossed, and looking at these facts we begin to wonder whether the later view of science, that qualities are not transmissible, is not right after all. It is fairly clear when we think of it that the moment we look closely into the theory of the evolution of the social qualities in man it breaks into pieces, for the social qualities that show themselves in the love of the mother for the child, and of the offspring for the parent, are found in the animal kingdom rather than among the savages. The animal will sacrifice its life to protect its young, while the savage takes his baby and dashes out its brains when the food supply runs short, holding it no wrong to do this to ensure the safety of those whom he thinks more useful to the tribe. Moreover, the animal that thus sacrifices its own life dies in the act of sacrifice, and cannot hand on that heroic quality, that passion of love which comes to an end in the very moment of its expression; so that even were acquired qualities transmissible we should not be helped to the evolution of the social qualities, which are a disadvantage in the struggle for existence, as Huxley pointed out. Then we do not find that the families of the greatest men manifest the high mental or moral qualities which the father may have shown, and one must often be struck with the disadvantages placed in the way of evolution by the fact of the genius. Genius, says science, is sterile, and that is true. Where we find one or two generations of artistic or musical talent, for instance, preceding the birth of a genius, we see that after it has flowered into this great and splendid manifestation the family declines. It seems to have done its work. Those preceding generations led up to the production of a body sufficiently sensitive and a brain delicately organised to provide a fitting temple for the incoming spirit; but genius has no posterity, and materialistic science in acknowledging this gave us no hope that our race would really rise into some future splendour of achievement that would dwarf all the civilisations of the past.

Turning to the religious idea, Mrs. Besant said this fell into two great divisions. There was the idea that man is specially created by God put forward by the Jewish and the Christian religions, Islam following these along the same line of thought. Man is unique, unrelated to the animals that went before him, with an infinite future, although he begins with birth. The religions tending to anthropomorphism show out this idea; the philosophical religions, on the other hand, give us rather the idea of man as an emanation from the divine nature, sharing that nature and containing within itself all divine possibilities. In regard to the Hebrew idea, we should remember that in the books of the Apocrypha there are suggestions and hints of sublimer conceptions than are to be found in the Canonical scriptures. In the time of Josephus there was a full recognition amongst the Jews of the great truth of reincarnation, although in the earlier scriptures we find, on the contrary, that man, though specially created, was said to perish at death. This is not reasserted in the prophetic books after the Captivity, nor in the Apocrypha, where we find a phrase that stands out in startling contrast to the statement in Genesis that "God created man in his own image, in his own image created he him; male and female created he them." In the Apocrypha it is written, "God made man in the image of his own eternity." How different the atmosphere! In the one case the image of God is an outer form, in the other it is a likeness of nature, of identity, of existence. And in that view that God created man in the image of his own eternity the Hebrew faith joins hands with all the religions of the further East.

Continuing, Mrs. Besant showed how the Jewish and Christian idea carried with it the idea of a fall from original righteousness, and although Anglicans probably do not believe this at the present time, every clergyman who is ordained has to repeat among the Thirty-nine Articles the ninth article, which sets forth an idea that is a blasphemy against God. For those who can no longer accept that view of man, what remains from the standpoint of religion? There remains the ancient view of man found in the Eastern faiths as embodied in their scriptures, that man is a direct emanation from God, and a sharer in the divine nature—a phrase that St. Paul used in language far transcending the thought expressed by orthodox Christianity. Man is not corrupt and wicked naturally, but he has every possibility of good within him, and these he gradually unfolds as he climbs upward to the source whence he came. Man is a thought-form of God ("Brahma meditated and man came forth"); he is far more than immortal and everlasting; he is eternal as God is eternal, and while God lives man cannot perish. That is the essential truth.

After giving a description of the wonderful process of the unfolding of consciousness through rough forms of matter once regarded as lifeless, Mrs. Besant explained the Theosophical belief that man has ever had great teachers helping him in his evolution. The childish and ignorant nations were not left to themselves, but were always guided by divine instructors who taught them their earliest knowledge of nature, of art, of the laws that must govern anything worthy to be called society. Gradually, as the child grew up, these wise teachers withdrew their help so that the human spirit might grow more self-reliant, and acquire knowledge by the putting forth of its own powers. That meant the possibility of making many mistakes, of much suffering and pain; but although men lost their former happiness, they gained in power and thought and freedom. Every fragment of liberty has been paid for temporarily in happiness, but only so could man learn the self-control he would never have attained while he was guided at every step. The divinity within him has not yet unfolded in its fulness, and before his ever-expanding consciousness still stretch vast avenues of progress in which he shall become the maker of new worlds and universes, building into them the knowledge that he is now acquiring, until he reaches that union with God which every mystic proclaims.

THE TASK OF THE TEACHER.

IN her presidential address to the Conference of the Association of Head Mistresses at Bristol on Saturday, Miss Robertson (Christ's Hospital, Hertford) alluded to the establishment of the Teachers' Registration Council, which she believed would mark an era in English educational history. She hoped to see evolving from it a self-governing profession whose extraordinary diversity would act as a wholesome antidote to professional narrowness. In the work of national education it was obvious that England started late, and many of their difficulties arose from the haste inseparable from previous sluggishness. The Scots in 300 years had at least developed a respect for education and a real grasp of its meaning which was still rare in England. Germany learnt much 100 years ago in a school of bitter adversity. The education of the middle class in England was still in the present day meagre and uneven, and elementary education itself had been planned from the outside without considered or philosophic basis, without distinct purpose. But whatever the strength or weakness of the elementary schools; there was one grave fact which struck at the root of their service to the nation. It was estimated that three-quarters of the children educated therein received no further education after the age of 14. Before education could be called in any sense national that problem must be grappled with. She did not believe it would be solved along any one line—certainly not by the mere multiplication of secondary schools of any pattern yet evolved. If teachers failed in quantity or quality it would not be wholly because of poor salaries or hard conditions, but for want of vision, of faith and hope. If the task of the teacher was belittled, it was partly because teachers themselves failed to realise the full scope of their task, and still more because they did not work as a band of brothers. There were certain influences making for greater unity among teachers, and she pointed to the Registration Council and the register as the finest weapon for the teachers themselves. In the course of a discussion on the shortage of teachers in elementary schools, the President uttered a warning. "If this shortage continues," she declared, "the education of the mass of the nation must suffer. The problem is a very grave one. Every school in the kingdom is at stake, if the education at the base of the pillar is in jeopardy, as I believe it to be, owing to the shortage of teachers in our elementary schools."

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

THREE weeks of the Mission have come and gone before an opportunity has offered for a brief reference to its doings. Whit-week breaks into the programme after the first fortnight, and the Mission has to stand aside for other pressing matters. From now onwards till October there should be a steady run of meetings if the weather holds. Ministers have given their promises for the greater part of the time, and only a few weeks have yet to be arranged for.

The number of open-air meetings in aid of every conceivable cause takes away a good deal of the novelty that attached to the work in earlier seasons, and the attendances seem likely to be less than in former years. Question time shows that opinion has hardened against liberal religion in some of the districts, and where opposition shows itself the work is more difficult and therefore more necessary. In one district the advent of the Van led to an organised counter movement that came out with flags and music night after night, and failed. Brass bands, too, are more numerous, and make platform work more trying, but the reports are encouraging, and well-wishers may accept the assurance that the Missioners are cheered by their experiences so far. The Welsh Van remained at Sirhowy for a fortnight, and at the end of that time a Unitarian society was formed, which is to work on quietly during the summer in the hope that the South-East Wales committee will help in the autumn with a course of lectures, and a plan for permanent meetings. The Midland Van opened well at Gainsborough, and then drew a blank at Retford. Last week at Worksop it was on ground that the Sheffield District Society intend developing later in the year, and a number of friends who are interested in the cause were met with. The report reaches us that one of these good friends, who is not a Unitarian, pondered well into the night as to how a site for a church could be managed, and how he could render assistance. A day or two afterwards came a cheque for £5 for the Mission from this practical sympathiser, with all sorts of good wishes. The North-West Van has done well at all places, and the run into North Wales will be watched with interest. The London meetings have been well attended, and keen interest has been evoked in each district. Next week Missions will be held in Brynmawr, Eckington, Limehouse and Chester.

A MEETING in support of the Bill dealing with the age of consent, which was introduced in the House of Lords by the Bishop of London, and passed its second reading in April, will be held at Caxton Hall, on June 26, at 8 p.m. It is expected that the committee stage will shortly be reached and Mr. H. M. Tyrer, secretary of the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, 37, Norfolk-street, Strand, W.C., will be pleased to supply copies of suggested resolutions, or forms of petitions for despatch to members of the House of Lords, to religious bodies, societies dealing with this matter, and all interested in moral betterment, if application is made to him.

THE annual meeting of the Lancashire and Cheshire Provincial Assembly will be held at Manchester on Wednesday, June 24. The religious service will be held in the Cross-street Chapel, at 11 a.m., the devotional part being conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Bolton, and the sermon being preached by the Rev. G. A. Payne, of Knutsford. The business meeting will be held in the Memorial Hall, Albert-square, at 2 p.m., Mr. J. Wigley, ex-president, in the chair. An address will be given by Dr. J. E. Odgers, of Oxford. Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, J.P., will take the chair at the evening meeting in the Memorial Hall, when addresses will be delivered by the Rev. R. T. Herford, of Stand, on "The Modern Peril to Religion," Dr. Mellone, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, on "What is Progress in Religion?" and Dr. G. Jesse, M.A., M.B., of Atherton, on "Religion and Social Progress."

APPEAL FOR COUNTRY HOLIDAY FUND.—Mr. R. Asquith Wooding, treasurer of the Country Holiday Fund in connection with the London Sunday School Society, writes as follows, from Brooklyn, High-road, North Finchley, N.:—"I venture to ask whether any of your readers will help towards replacing the contributions of former subscribers now no longer with us. The work grows year by year, but the subscription list does not show a corresponding increase; it is, in fact, all we can do to maintain it at its present level. Last year, no less than 557 scholars from 15 of the London Schools were assisted towards a country holiday, and this year we expect to be asked to help at least as many. Primarily the Fund is intended to assist the elder scholars and others, who, for some reason or other cannot be sent away through the auspices of the National Fund; but many of the Missions much prefer to send their younger children away through their denominational fund, and help was therefore given last year to 187 scholars under 12 years old. If any of your readers can help the Fund by a small contribution, we shall be exceedingly grateful, and they may feel sure that the money subscribed will be money well spent. The Fund will be distributed early in July, so that all gifts should be sent before the close of the present month."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Barnard Castle.—The spring conference of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association was held this year at the Unitarian Church, Newgate, Barnard Castle, on Wednesday, June 10, the Rev. J. B. Robinson (Barnard Castle) presiding. The ministers of the churches in the district, and a number of visitors from Newcastle, Middlesbrough, Stockton, and Sunderland attended, as well as members of the Newgate congregation. The Rev. Alfred Hall, secretary of the Association, read a paper on "More Attractive Services," in the course of which he said people were attracted to the churches for one or more of three reasons—higher fellowship, worship, religious instruction—and religious services were held to promote these desires through devotional exercises and preaching. Higher fellowship was the outcome of mutual encouragement and sympathy which all could and should show to one another. Worship required a spirit of reverence, and the weakest church that endeavoured to maintain a reverent spirit in religious worship had a longer life than certain popular attempts to combine amusement with religion. If preaching was to attract, the preacher must have a message to proclaim that was vital, and teach religion, which had a connection with all man's interests and affairs. He should teach theology as an expression of the highest thought of the intellect of this and all time. A discussion followed, in which the Revs. H. V. Salmon and A. Scruton, and Messrs. Wright and Rowe took part. A public meeting was held at 6.30 p.m., the Rev. J. B. Robinson in the chair, when speeches were delivered by the Revs. H. V. Salmon (Sunderland), W. H. Lambelle (Middlesbrough), A. Scruton (Stockton), and A. Hall (Newcastle).

Knutsford.—A small sale of work and garden party was held last Saturday, June 13, at "The Gables," the home of Mrs. Woodhouse.

It was well attended, and resulted in £6 being added to the organ fund in connection with the Unitarian Church. The sale was opened by Mr. James R. Beard, J.P.

London: Ilford.—On Sunday afternoon, June 14, the second annual flower service of the Ilford Unitarian Sunday school was held. Mr. Stephen Noel, of Stratford, conducted the service, and gave an address. The offering of the flowers by the children and young people, who marched up in single file, and laid their bunches on tables placed in the chancel for that purpose, was a special feature of the service. Special messengers carried the flowers to Mansford-street Mission, Bethnal Green, to be distributed among the poor.

London: Islington.—A presentation of a clock has recently been made to Mr. Richard Gore by the members of Unity Church Sunday school in recognition of his able services as secretary for over seventeen years.

London: Woolwich.—It is reported that the Sunday school in connection with Carmel Chapel is increasing considerably in numbers, and that many of the elder children regularly attend the evening service.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The good effect of open-air preaching has been well illustrated in connection with the Unitarian Church at Stockton-on-Tees. The minister, the Rev. Arthur Scruton, has gone into the market place on many evenings during the past year, and explained the principles of his faith, giving his audience every opportunity to ask questions. The result is that he has doubled the membership of his church, many of the new comers never having been previously associated with church life. On Sunday last, June 14, at the anniversary services, the church was crowded, a thing unknown for many years past. On Monday the anniversary meeting was held, Councillor Rowley being in the chair. Among the speakers were the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, Mr. F. F. Perris (Middlesbrough), and the Rev. Alfred Hall (Newcastle) and all congratulated the minister and congregation on the splendid results achieved. The gathering was four times as large as the one which welcomed Mr. Scruton fifteen months ago.

Wales: Ciliau-Aeron.—The annual festival of the Cardiganshire Unitarian Musical Union was held at Soar Chapel (kindly lent for the occasion) on Monday, June 15, when there were present singers from all the Unitarian Churches in the county. The singing was of a high order and the chapel was filled to overflowing. Mr. Evan Richards, Llandysul, conducted, and Mrs. Evans, Cartref, presided at the organ. The morning meeting, which was set apart for children, was presided over by Dr. D. J. Davies, Aberystwyth. In the afternoon the Rev. E. Evans, Soar, presided, and presented certificates for proficiency in tonic sol-fa to numerous children. The Rev. E. O. Jenkins, Llwynrhydowen, presided over the evening meeting, and moved a vote of sympathy with the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones in his long illness. A musical programme followed.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE ARTS AND INDUSTRIES OF THE BLIND.

Dr. Estlin Carpenter writes to draw our attention to the Exhibition of the Arts and Industries of the Blind which is being held for a week (beginning on Thursday, June 18) at the Church House, Great Smith-street, Westminster, and which is the largest of its kind ever held. Among those interested is Mr. I. Yoshimoto, a former student of Manchester College, who has done so much for the blind in Japan. The Exhibition includes an immense variety of articles made by blind men, women and children in schools, workshops, homes and institutions in England and Wales, Scotland, Ireland, the Colonies and abroad, and at their own homes. Machines and apparatus are also being shown which can be used by or for the blind, or for the benefit of those threatened with blindness, and a collection of objects, books and pictures illustrating the history, education and training of the blind or connected with blindness, or with notable blind men and women. Hundreds of blind workers and societies for the blind are co-operating, and a special feature is the L.C.C. exhibit. The following trades are shown in progress by blind workers from many centres in the great hall:—Basket making, brush making, mat making, rug making, weaving, machine knitting, boot repairing, poultry farming, chair caning, typewriting, pianoforte tuning and repairing, mattress making and carpentry. The Exhibition will be open up to (and including) Wednesday, June 24, from 11 a.m. to 9 p.m., Sunday excepted.

MARK RUTHERFORD AT DITCHLING.

A writer in the Sussex Daily News recently paid a visit to the old Unitarian Meeting House at Ditchling, where Mr. Hale White (Mark Rutherford) as a young man occupied the pulpit for about eighteen months. From his account it seems to have changed very little since the year 1860, when Mark Rutherford first went there; it is still a bare and unpretentious building, with its old gallery ("I am sure I couldn't stand straight up in it"), and the seraphine, mentioned in a familiar passage in the "Autobiography," which is now placed in a different position. The man who was to become famous as an author was never happy at Ditchling, and his work at the chapel was, as he himself has told us, of the most lifeless kind. He was evidently very melancholy and self-centred during his stay in "the large straggling half-village, half-town," and he confesses that he preached with no heart for anything on the "real meaning of the death of Christ," which he thought might prove as attractive as any other subject. He was under the influence of a monomania which he could neither describe nor overcome, and the desire for love and sympathy consumed him. "Mark Rutherford had not then found the work he was born to do supremely well, and he was very unhappy till he found it."

"It is known that in Mark Rutherford's time," says the writer of the article, "the little Unitarian flock in the beautiful Wealden village was gathered from all the region round about—from Henfield, eight miles away in the west; Falmer, five miles over the hills; Hayward's Heath, seven miles north. Some of them are now in their last sleep under the grass by the chapel; graves have been there for two hundred years and more; and the tale of their lives, though commonplace for most part, could not have been without its pathos, and perhaps even its grandeur, of mortal strife and upward longing. Nothing of all this will be found in Mark Rutherford's story of his spiritual oversight at Ditchling. Whose blame was it that they were all so 'petrified' to him? I suspect that he was given to preaching over their heads, but as I looked in at the Meeting House window, and imagined him there in that poor little pulpit, I could not feel sure that his failure was due solely to this. Was there not an absence of human warmth on his part? Did he offer as much as he expected to receive? . . . Had he smiled upon little children, and taken them by the hand in those meadow walks he tells us of, and spoken kind words to them, would they now in later life have forgotten him? Still, we must take a man of unique nature as we find him, and if Mark Rutherford failed in a quiet corner of Sussex, he succeeded brilliantly in the great realm of literature."

THE USE OF SUGGESTION IN EDUCATION.

Dr. Boris Sidis, an able American writer, has said that "not sociality, not rationality, but suggestibility is what characterises the average specimen of humanity, for man is a suggestible animal," and he goes on to say that "the gregarious, the sub-personal, uncritical, social self, the mob self, and the suggestible sub-conscious self are identical." This is a rather learned way of stating that we are all very much influenced by others, and that the reason of the cleverest among us is sometimes entrapped by ideas introduced to it at what is called the psychological moment. The knowledge of the right use of suggestion, however, is an essential part of the equipment of a true educationist, for all children are docile to suggestion, and extremely receptive of the influence of those around them. That is why example is so much more important than mere precept. Poets and artists are, of course, peculiarly suggestible, but, as Dr. Bernard Hollander tells us, we are all more or less affected by this potent though generally unguided force. "The attachment of social life depends to a great extent on the degree of power of making and receiving suggestions, and the firmest friends and happiest couples in life are frequently those who are in this respect well matched. The measure of pleasure we get from life depends more on our suggestibility than on any other factor."

PORTUGUESE SLAVERY.

The Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society has addressed a communication to Sir Edward Grey expressing appreciation of the fact that British Consular inquiry confirms in almost every detail the allegations of slave owning and slave trading made by the Society against the Portuguese Colonial administration in West Africa. The Society draws attention to the slow rate of emancipation, and appeals to Sir Edward Grey to press the Portuguese Government to liberate and repatriate the slaves up to the carrying capacity of the ships. It is pointed out that if the Portuguese were in earnest in this matter they could set free and restore to the mainland nearly 20,000 per annum; whereas, last year only 2,071 were set free.

A PROPOSED UNIVERSITY IN JERUSALEM.

Rabbi Dr. Salamon read a paper on "The Proposed Hebrew University" at the Conference of Jewish Ministers held in Whitechapel last week. This University, he said, was to be situated in Jerusalem, for the value of historic environment could not be overrated, and as far as possible classic Hebrew should be the spoken tongue. The University would not confine itself to specifically Jewish subjects, but to such departments of learning as philosophy, history and archaeology, and the main line of study and research connected with them should be treated from a Jewish standpoint. Rabbi Mendelssohn spoke on the organisation of religious education, and the Rev. A. A. Green dealt with the same subject, differing from Rabbi Mendelssohn in claiming that the centre of gravity of Judaism was not the Talmud, but the Bible. The effect of teaching religion from the basis of the Talmud and not of the Bible was to place the ceremonial before the ethical side of Judaism. They might deplore ethics without the ceremonial, but there was an ethical standard in Judaism which must be kept in the forefront of the life of the Jew and the religious training of his child.

THE WORN-OUT HORSE TRAFFIC.

Speaking as chairman at the annual meeting of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Sir Edward Ward gave the gratifying information that a company was being formed for the purpose of purchasing horses in this country when they were unfit for further work, and of having them humanely destroyed in England. The Society had no financial responsibility in the matter, but many of the members were taking a keen interest in the proposed company. It had necessarily to be run on commercial lines, but the aims and objects of the society would be carried out and protected by the board of directors, some of whom were prominent humanitarians. He felt sure that when started it would be the means of removing what had been a reproach to this country for so many years.

THE INTERNATIONAL ABOLITIONIST FEDERATION.

The International Abolitionist Federation founded by Josephine Butler in 1875 has just held a conference at Portsmouth at which important papers on questions relating to public morality were read. The enrolling of women police in all cases in which women are concerned was discussed among other things, and Frau Scheven, who dealt with local policy in Germany, laid great stress on the invaluable work done by women in this capacity. At Mainz a woman was the actual head of the Moral Department of the police force. Through her efforts young girls and children were protected from contact with the criminal police, and a home had been opened to which girls could be sent for immediate shelter. The Bishop of Winchester, who presided at the welcome meeting to the delegates, emphasised the fact that abolition in itself was only negative. Those who met under its banner had another and a more lasting purpose. The flame that burned in Mrs. Butler's soul was one of passionate desire to achieve the liberation of the young, chiefly by their own noble selves, from the deadly evil of impurity and from the train of evil, moral and physical, which it drew along behind it.

WALTER COVENTRY, A. S. RODGERS, and GEO. INGLEDEW.—No. 59 quite correct.

CHAS. WILLING (U.S.A.).—Your solutions are quite correct.

City of London Chess Club.—The sixty-first annual report has just been issued, and our No. 62 is a problem quoted from it. Although it is, without doubt, the premier British chess club, it numbers amongst its members but a very few problem composers. Mr. Antony Guest, chess editor of the Morning Post, is an honorary member, and he has contributed to the problem section of the report. Dr. J. Schumer is chess editor of the Westminster Gazette, and is a strong player as well as a problem expert. The C.L.C.C. champion for 1914 is Mr. Edward Lasker (no relation to the world's champion, though the latter is an honorary member). The club is in a financially sound position, and the membership numbers close on 250. The club does not take part in many matches, but important contests are held in its rooms. The Varsity match was played here on March 23, Oxford winning by 4½ to 2½. The Club played the combined Universities on March 18, winning comfortably by 13½ to 6½ games. The veteran Blackburne was seen at our Club this week, when he played some off-hand games. The writer has been one of the honorary auditors for some years.

The Larger Life.

A Way through Experience towards the Truth.

By JOHN DENDY,

Author of Successful Life: A Series of Essays.

This book is concerned with certain great questions which lie behind all forms of religion and with which all forms of religion are more or less closely bound up.

The questions are such as these: "What are we?" "Is there such a being as God, and if so, what is His nature?" "How are we related to God?" "What is the nature of this universe in which we find ourselves?" "What do we mean by such words as 'Matter' and 'Spirit'?" "What is the meaning and object of our lives?"

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE loss of the "Children's Employment Bill" in the House of Commons is greatly to be deplored. No doubt the Bill would have passed the second reading but for the action of Lancashire, which opposes the abolition of the half-timer. In the matter of child labour Lancashire has a bad record. She has placed her factory system above and before the welfare of the child. All educational authorities are agreed that half-time employment for children while of school age is thoroughly bad. In almost every other part of the country public opinion has so insistently declared against the half-time system that it has disappeared—much to the advantage both of the school and the child. If it is possible to do without the half-timer in hosiery and shoe factories why not in the cotton industry, the richest and most prosperous of all the trades in our land? It is an obscurantist survival of an old and evil tradition, demanded by people who have no real belief in education at all, and maintained by the votes of Members of Parliament who apparently have more concern for the safety of their seats than for educational progress.

THE centenary of peace between England and the United States of America is being celebrated both here and there in a series of dinners, balls, and social functions, marked by great brilliance and popularity. We could wish that there had been some joint action on the part of the churches of both lands to commemorate the past, and to seal a pact of peace for the future. It is true that hostility ending in war between the two nations is an almost unthinkable contingency, and yet when one remembers how easily the jingo spirit is roused, and how eager the yellow press always is to bang the drum, thoughtful people and lovers of goodwill ought to see that the churches are in the van of those who seek peace and ensue it. Happily, peace between the two nations has now become so generally accepted as the natural thing that the very memory of past disputes is fading away. There was a time, not so very long ago, when Brother Jonathan loved to twist the tail of the British Lion, and the British Lion was not slow in return at showing his teeth and claws. To-day all that appears supremely ridiculous. We can only wish that the churches as a whole had shown themselves more worthy of the blessing promised to the peacemakers.

IN this connection, attention may be called to a little book by Mr. G. W. Perris on "The War Traders." The provision of warships and war materials has fallen into the hands of half-a-dozen huge combines, whose interest it is to fan the war fever in every country under the sun. Mr. Norman Angell has clearly shown that as between nation and nation war does not and cannot pay. But war panics and preparation just as well answer the purpose of these huge combines, and enable them to pay enormous dividends to their shareholders. The influence of these powerful groups of traders in war material is felt both in the public press and in Parliament. Year by year the cry goes up for more guns and more Dreadnoughts, and still more guns and Dreadnoughts, world without end. Mr. Perris's book is a strong indictment of the whole system of providing war material by private trade. It is a system that easily lends itself to political corruption, and that tends to over-ride the public interest in the interest of private gain.

THE series of impressive meetings held in London by the Salvation Army during the last two weeks, and attended every day, it is said, by 10,000 persons, came to an end on Tuesday, the 23rd, the gathering at the Crystal Palace exceeding in numbers anything before known in connection with the Army. From all over the world delegates came to testify of the work in many lands. From East and West, from North and South they came, Hindus, Koreans, Javanese, Finns, Swedes, Africans, Maoris, Germans, Dutch, Frenchmen, many of them dressed in bizarre costumes, flooding the streets with a blaze of colour, and carrying their blood and fire banners. The success of the Army, judged by its organisation, is unparalleled in the history of the Christian Church. General Bramwell Booth reported that the Army has to-day 9,516 outposts and stations, 16,438 officers, 55,520 local officers, 26,000 bandmen, 1,168 social institutions, and a spiritual fervour that increases year by year.

"Soul-saving," said the General, "is still the Army's chief business."

It is not too much to say that the great congress met with nothing but welcome and goodwill from the Churches of all denominations. Neither their theology nor their methods are ours, but we too rejoice in the soul-saving and rescue work of the Army amid the submerged tenth of the population, which no other agency appears to touch with real effect. Not so very long ago it seemed as if the Army might perish before the ridicule heaped upon it by the press and by nearly all educated persons. It offended good taste, its leaders and officers were shockingly ignorant of Biblical criticism and the work of science. It had neither scholarship nor philosophy. Even its social schemes went sadly astray at the first, owing to want of knowledge and training. But to-day it appears as a victor all along the line. It has overcome nearly all opposition. Huxley's jeering definition of it as "Corybantic Christianity" troubles nobody. The King sends to the General congratulations and good wishes, and society follows the King's example.

* * *

In truth the Army has reached the most dangerous stage in its history—the stage when all men speak well of it. No one can prophesy concerning its future. Whether, in a democratic age like the present, a religious movement which is a pure autocracy can hold its own in that particular form remains to be seen. Its founders, General Booth the first, and his wife, were persons of singular gifts and eminence. Its spiritual impulse came in the first instance from Mrs. Booth, a woman among ten thousand, of winning manner, persuasive speech, and a mystic temper. Her husband was by nature a great ecclesiastic, bearing a strong resemblance in feature to Cardinal Manning and other monarchical leaders. He had the high, narrow forehead, the prominent cheek-bones, the eagle beak, the piercing eye, and the dogged jaw of the born autocrat. But with that temperament he had also gifts that do not often accompany autocracy—a world-wide sympathy, a deep compassion for the neglected, the fallen and the outcast, and a faith in God and the Gospel so ardent that difficulties went down before it like wisps of straw before the wind. He was a wonderful instance of will-power consecrated to the highest uses.

ONE element in the success of the Army is its appeal to the spirit of romance and adventure. It sends forth its converts and missionaries with drums beating and banners flying like Knights-Templar of other days, to face the ridicule of the world, and wrestle with the powers of darkness. It imposes on all its officers the pledge of poverty. They are like Spenser's Red-Cross Knight, on "a great adventure bent," which may take them to frozen seas or torrid plains, or lonely islands or busy marts, in obedience to commands from headquarters. And, as a rule, they have bravely answered to the call made upon their chivalry. Would that every Church could call forth the same spirit of service and sacrifice and romance!

* * *

THE National Free Church Council, which deliberately excludes from its ranks the freest of all the free churches, is embarking on what is called "one of the greatest religious campaigns ever undertaken in the history of Great Britain." The "Come to Church Sunday," an invention of our go-ahead cousins in the United States, is to be given a trial here. The object is to secure on a given Sunday in January next the attendance at church of every man, woman, and child in the Kingdom. The event is to be worked up by a gigantic system of visitation. Every home in the land is to be visited by representatives of the Churches, who will leave a personal invitation for every inmate to put in an appearance at church. It is not intended to be a sectarian or merely denominational movement. Members of various denominations are to be enlisted in a national canvass, so that no one escapes the appeal to be made. It is averred that the plan has well succeeded in many parts of the States, great numbers of people who had abandoned church-going being induced to return. We wonder!

WE greatly distrust these schemes for reviving Church attendance born of a passion for doing something big. Megalomania is a disease we should be sorry to see caught and embraced by the Christian Church. Both in the States and in this country we have learned that revivals which depend on working up excitement by glaring advertisements, extensive organisation, perfervid appeal and much publicity, produce little or no lasting results. There is a flash in the pan, and soon all is over. Far more fruitful results follow from the quiet, steady, patient work of Churches, each carefully working its own corner of the vineyard. "Nothing will win men back to the Church," Professor Eucken tells us, but "stirring a demand for an inner uplift of human nature, for a new idealism. And this demand will necessarily have to seek an alliance with religion. No matter how many opponents religion may still encounter, stronger than all opponents, stronger even than all intellectual difficulties, is the necessity of the spiritual self-preservation of humanity and man. . . . But the return to religion is by no means a return to the old forms of religion."

* * *

Now a return to church attendance, although greatly to be desired, is by no means the same thing as a return to religion. The churches will be refilled with eager, happy-hearted worshippers when men once again feel the needs and pressure and claims of the spiritual life. Meanwhile we do not hope much from the modern craving for what is big, sensational, and much advertised. It is of great significance that Jesus never sought the multitude, that statistics had no interest for him, that he beat no drum and carried no banner. If the multitude—the big thing, the crowd—came where he was, it awakened in him a certain pathos. Christianity in its beginning—whatever it became in later years—was intensive. It had no dream of big things as such, but of true things. The whole Christian Church was once gathered together in an upper chamber of a private house, and did not muster more than 120 souls. All this is not to despise numbers, but it is to beware of megalomania.

* * *

MGR. BENSON'S lecture at Caxton Hall on "Modern Miracles" challenged the idea that "suggestion" had anything to do with the cures recorded at Lourdes. His most certain conclusion was that no scientific explanation yet framed could account for these wonderful cures. He had asked a great scientific authority, Dr. Carrel, "What about suggestion?" Dr. Carrel laughed and replied, "All those people who talk about suggestion do not know what they are talking about." Yet the commission on Faith or Mind Healing appointed by Convocation, and consisting of an equal number of clergymen and eminent medical men, declares that cures by suggestion are just as real as cures by prayer, and while frankly admitting the power of prayer as a curative agent, equally insists on the power of suggestion. Indeed, a careful consideration of the whole subject compels one to the conclusion that prayer itself is a form of suggestion. Even Mgr. Benson stated he "was not certain whether or not vitality was imparted to the afflicted by those who sympathised with them in the multitude and the whole people present." But what suggestive power belongs to the sympathy of a friendly multitude.

THE REVIVAL OF RELIGION IN OUR CHURCHES.

THERE are those who dislike the word revival as savouring too much of the extravagances associated with evangelical revivals. But we should all rejoice to see a real revival of religion in our Churches, a new birth of life and power. We are expectantly waiting and watching for just this consummation of our faith. We welcome eagerly every encouraging word, every hopeful prophecy, every material fact that points to the day of better things. We frown upon a too close statistical survey of the situation, as regards attendance at worship or Church membership. Any hint that all is not well with us is met with the rebuke that the croakers have always said so.

No doubt there are limits to the usefulness of gloomy self-criticism and self-depreciation. We do need to "put a cheerful courage on," to put on the garment of praise, rather than the spirit of heaviness. The vitality and significance of religion is never a question of numbers merely, or of outward prosperity or of worldly consideration. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned. The great religions have had their origin not in great numbers, or wealth, or influence, but in great souls; in men of faith and vision, men who attained an authentic revelation of the Divine life and will. Revivals or new births of religion have always sprung, and must always spring, from the presence of God in the souls of men. It is the realisation of the Divine Presence that is the necessary starting point of all spiritual life and power. This is a simple statement of fact, and is no disparagement of numbers or of wealth or of influence as such. It would be a glorious thing if the call of the Church in the well-known hymn were to meet with a universal response:

All people that on earth do dwell,
Sing to the Lord with cheerful voice;
Him serve with mirth, His praise forth tell,
Come ye before Him and rejoice.

Doubtless wealth and influence may be consecrated instruments of the Divine purpose. But the first thing, the absolutely essential thing, is a living faith. The glory of God shining in our hearts is the one thing needful in our religious life and in our life as a Church.

This being so, the revival of religion in our Churches is in our hands, as members and ministers of the Churches. We may wait for it and watch for it. We must also prepare for it and begin it in ourselves. What we need as individuals and as Churches is a new and more thoroughgoing spiritual discipline, a more practical realisation of spiritual realities. We must accustom ourselves to be more with God if we would gather into our souls the impulses and energies of a living faith.

It is to be doubted whether new life can come to our Churches except by the revival among us of the practice of private devotion, devotional reading and daily communion with God. For ministers and laymen alike, regular seasons of prayer and meditation, apart from public worship, are necessary, and of central importance to the soul's well-being.

We need also a new attitude with regard to public worship. We must realise that it is an authoritative command laid upon us by the spirit that is in us, to assemble and meet together for praise and prayer as children of one Heavenly Father. Worship is the highest of all social arts, uniting us in one love and obedience, harmonising our differences and inequalities, fitting us all for one mission and service—the fashioning of a divine humanity. "Heed not," said Dr. Martineau, "the fastidious critic who tells you that the world has outgrown the Church—that the living voice of trust and aspiration shall soon have no response from sorrowing and struggling men. Depend upon it, his is the humour of the hour; and you who keep to the old reverent ways are taking sides with the perpetuity of our humanity. Fear not that you have here to do with any perishable work. Crowd the pavement of the Church with the aged and the young; make it the favourite storehouse of earnest vows and living sacrifice; train its echoes to sweet and holy hymns, that shall blend soul with soul, and carry all to God; and, thus sanctified, let it stand by night and day a silent witness to the world of invisible and heavenly things."

Something might be done to increase the beauty of our services. For a free people we are singularly conservative in our acceptance of things as they are. Every Church has its own traditions, and there are considerable divergencies amongst us as to the order of public worship; but it should be the ideal of every congregation to worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness, and to see that everything about the Church and the service ministers to that end.

This is not the place to dwell upon our duty to the young people of our Churches, but it must be borne in mind. We need to have a constant regard for their religious training and welfare, and by our increasing faithfulness build them up in faith. Character is never so securely based as when it is founded on the love of God. Wherefore "Nourish thy children, O thou good nurse, and stablish their feet."

Finally, it would be well if we could more fully realise and appreciate our organic connection with Christianity. We are, of course, organically connected in our faith with the universal religious experience of mankind; but we are nearest to Christianity, in direct line of descent from it. Theologically we often feel ourselves aliens in Christendom, but devotionally and spiritually we are members of the Church of Christ throughout all ages. We ought "to feel the sap of this great tree of life in our veins welling up" unto life eternal. "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." Have we perhaps missed the significance of this good news of Christ?

"CONSIDER."

OF Nazareth meadows I dream,
A far-away valley I see,
There cometh a whisper beside me—
"Consider the lilies with Me."

"How wise are the ways of the flowers
That bloom, if it were but a day,
To give to the meadows a glory,
Divine, though it fadeth away!"

O Master, but mine is a world
Where little is lovely or fair;
The lilies are sweet in the valley,
But sad is the city of care.

Around is the shadow of doubt,
And faces are anxious and worn,
And many a worker is weary,
And many a morrow forlorn.

"Consider"—I hear it again,
And lo, as I listen, a gleam
Breaks out from the heart of the shadow,
And lightens the way of my dream.

O Master, if thou be the Guide,
If faith in the Father be ours,
Our life shall go singing of sunshine,
Our love shall be fairer than flowers.

OUR HUMAN NEEDS TO-DAY.

BY THE REV. LAWRENCE CLARE.

THIS subject is so vast that I may reasonably be permitted to limit myself to a consideration of "Our Human Needs" only in so far as they are the direct concern of the Church. It will be convenient to divide such needs into those of the body, the mind, and the soul, and to treat of them in that order.

Firstly, then, we are to consider man's bodily needs, his elementary demand for food, clothing, and shelter. Here, perhaps, the most important thing to remember, if we are to see how the Church can effectively deal with the social question, is the fact that possessions do not in themselves constitute wealth. The golden crosier and cross of emeralds which are buried with the body of St. Carlo Borromeo at Milan are not (as Ruskin well reminds us) wealth in those dead and unavailing hands. To convert possessions into wealth there must be life, wisdom, and virtue in the possessor. Here, then, comes the opportunity of the Church. It is not concerned with party politics, or even with the intricacies of political economy; but it is concerned, and that deeply, with life, wisdom, and virtue, and therefore with the ethical side of the social question. The importance of the work to be done in this direction can hardly be over-estimated, since, however perfect a political or economic scheme may be on paper, it will fail when applied to life if human nature be not ready for it. It is proverbial that you cannot legislate successfully ahead of public opinion, and history shows only too clearly that the soul of man will express itself for just what it is worth, for evil as well as for good, no matter how cleverly you may devise schemes to repress or tame it. The church should, therefore, devote itself chiefly to the dissemination of ideas, and especially to giving an ethical content to the modern social concepts. The practical man may shrug his shoulders, saying that mere ideas are worthless, but it is nevertheless thought that moves the world, and the practical man only exists to carry out the will of the thinker. So the Church need not fear that she will waste her strength.

A few brief words on the ethics of earning and spending will serve to illustrate how the social question may be thus approached. As to the earning of wealth, may not the Church teach clearly that no man who has the strength to work has the right to be idle? Every moment of our lives in all parts of the world men are working for you and for me—fighting the stormy sea, or groping in the darkness of the mine, or toiling in the heat of the furnace. These are our conscripts (as Carlyle expresses it), facing danger and death that we may live in safety, well clothed and fed. Here, then, is our debt to the world, a debt of honour not to be repudiated save by the coward. The world must not be the worse off for our having been born into it. There is no more shameful dishonesty than that of taking all and giving nothing. And, as no man has the right to be perpetually idle, so also no man has the right to provide falsely for the world's needs. Work must not be solely for profits. Like the minister or the soldier, the merchant too should have his code of honour, and his law of sacrifice, prepared to face poverty without fear rather than consent to be false to his function of providing for bodily needs.

As to spending wealth, here too ethical considerations should not be ignored. For what is money? Is it not power over human labour? And to spend money is to determine in what direction that labour shall flow. It is a sentencing of men to this life or that. Surely we incur no light responsibility if we thus condemn men to dangerous and futile labour, or to the sweater's den, or to the doing of cruel deeds to minister to feminine vanity.

Turning now from the economic needs which man shares with the beasts to consider the æsthetic and mental needs which are so essentially human, let us remember that the Christian Church has been far kinder to man's love of beauty than to his love of truth. At one time, indeed, all the arts were subordinate to the Church, so that painting, sculpture, music, and even the drama could hardly claim a separate existence. And to-day great cathedrals, which seem to be less the work of man than of Nature herself, testify even in their decaying splendour to the efforts made by the Church during the Middle Ages to satisfy the passion for beauty. No longer do we build churches akin in their grandeur to forest and precipice. The "long drawn aisle and fretted vault," the "storied windows, richly dight," the "branching roof Self-poised, and scooped into ten thousand cells, Where light and shade repose, where music dwells Linger—and wandering on as loth to die";—these are the creation of a distant past. No longer, perhaps, is such an ideal possible; but at least we may build with artistic sincerity. If, moreover, by some happy chance we are enabled to build elaborately and beautifully, let not that be called pride which is really humility—the humility which would offer only our very best to God, and which is glad to take advantage of the inspiration that comes from great architecture, from resplendent colour, and from intense symbolism. I plead, therefore, for beautiful buildings, with every line and colour subordinate to the purpose for which the church was built. I plead too for music, and services of stately dignity, dominated by the conception of the Beauty of Holiness, for Service high and anthems clear

As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all Heaven before mine eyes.

If we think for a moment what it would be like to hear one of our own finest services in the setting of a great church like York Minster, we shall realise perhaps as never before how much Beauty contributes to worship. Perhaps we have thought too little of this.

If we may be accused of neglecting in some degree man's need for beauty, we have, at any rate, the satisfaction of feeling that almost alone among the churches ours has sought to satisfy his passion for truth. We all know how throughout the very period when the great cathedrals were being built it was thought sinful to think too boldly about the greatest and most absorbing of all subjects. In the bitter and prolonged struggle that followed Socinus and his adherents took a noble part, and to them we owe the modern principle of toleration. This debt is incalculable. Professor Bury even goes so far as to say that "the establishment of this liberty may be considered the most valuable achievement of modern civilisation." Into this grand heritage we enter with the knowledge that the men who fought and suffered for it were our spiritual ancestors. It is no light task to be worthy of such ancestry. To-day we are called to complete their work by concentrating upon the problem of religious reconstruction, and by proving in doctrine, life, and worship that the intellect does not demand the sacrifice of the devotional spirit.

The gain in freedom is also a gain in dignity and grandeur. Religion itself is enriched by the discoveries of the scientist, and the results of research. The much-abused Higher Criticism destroyed a fetish, but gave to us a book which glows with spiritual genius, and the very reading of which introduces us to half the civilisations of the ancient world. The progress of astronomy, geology, and kindred sciences has loosened the clutch of ancient fears, destroyed the gods of caprice, and kindled the hope that man is not final. "What is the ape to man?" cries Nietzsche. "A laughing-stock, and a thing of shame. So shall man be to Superman." Science, too, has provided the raw material for grander religious conceptions. We look back, and lo! infinite vistas of time; we look forward, and there is infinite time ahead. Thus is our conception of time revolutionised. So also with space. The earth is but a mote in the sunbeams. The midnight heavens reveal solar system beyond solar system; and even universe beyond universe. Yet thought can travel to the most distant star, so that man seems to grow greater with the enlarging universe—man whose whole dignity lies in thought. Has not, then, the boldness of the religious free-thinker been justified?

Lastly, we are to consider man's spiritual needs, which I must, of necessity, deal with briefly; but let not the brevity be taken as an indication of the degree of importance attached to what, after all, is infinitely the most important side of our work.

Man's greatest spiritual need is for another quality of life. He is conscious of a radical cleavage in his personality, sometimes, indeed, so deep that he feels almost as though he were two selves. There is the lower or animal self, which seems to belong to the past of the human race, and there is the higher or spiritual self, which seems to belong to the future. The life of the lower self is steeped in time; its highest pleasures are mocked by the grave; upon it there falls the sarcasm of eternity. Of the nature of the life of the higher self we may learn most from the teaching of men and women of spiritual genius, and by interrogating our own experience when we stand upon the Mount of Vision. It is unfortunate, perhaps, that science is so late in the field, for until William James wrote his epoch-making book on "The Varieties of Religious Experience," this region was almost unexplored, and mystical experience was even looked upon as a mirage. But the testimony of the saints of all religions is remarkably consistent, and the Buddhist as well as the Christian exults in the thought of another quality of life obtainable here and now by all who are prepared to pay the price. That life is too wonderful for description; it is, indeed, in the strict sense of the word, ineffable. Even poetry and music can only hint at the splendour of it, but as it is written, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." This life can only be won through sacrifice. We must die to live, absolutely and without reserve, for Christianity knows no compromise; we must identify ourselves with the Divine Life within. In this subordination of man's animal nature to the spiritual will be found the key to the meaning of life. Christ tells us that we must be born again, thus indicating that it is perfectly natural for man to seek and obtain peace in this way.

For those, indeed, who feel conscious of this conflict between the two selves this "re-birth" is simply the next step in spiritual evolution, and it is as natural as it is for the bird to fly when its wings have developed, or as it is for the dragon-fly to emerge in its beauty from its larva.

The Church, then, is to make this teaching effective, and it is difficult to see how that duty can be better discharged than by preaching the Gospel of Christ and stressing his personality. It would be a tragic mistake to depart from Christian tradition, in which we have a true and saving religion adapted to the Western mind. In Jesus we may see, and hence feel, the compelling beauty of the spiritual life in all its purity. He is the incarnate "Dweller in the Innermost." His life is of the nature of a prophecy, for we all feel the call, however feeble our attainment may be, to scale those spiritual heights. Christianity sets before us the greatest conceivable ideal—that of the production of a race of Christs.

THE QUEENS IN THE MARKET

NOT a soul was at work. The great market stood empty. Under its spacious arched roof the flowers and vegetables were spread or stacked in lavish abundance—a beautiful sight. The fruit was still packed up in cases waiting to be opened, and a rough idea of the supply in store might be gathered from the number and size of the crates and baskets devoted to this purpose. Food for a nation! one might exclaim. There it lay waiting to be unpacked and distributed to the multitudes in the great city and the lesser towns and the little villages and hamlets, but no one was there to do it. No labourers or porters, no warehousemen or carters or salesmen to open the packages, to load the lorries and to send the delicious and wholesome contents far and wide.

What had happened? Had the clock tricked us? Had we got up hours earlier than we intended and come down to the market before the busy throng of market-men arrived? Ah! would it be possible to do that? I once strolled into Covent Garden Market and found it deserted. Stacks of produce and banks of flowers surrounded me as I crept in where the great iron gateway had been left ajar. Not a voice, not a footfall in that hive of industry whence the daily needs of rich and poor are supplied. It was a strange experience. But that was at night—late, as I was passing homeward, and my adventure was soon cut short. I was espied by the night-watchman—"No admission there!" he cried sharply, as he caught sight of me gazing in the dimly reflected electric light at a mountain of red and white azaleas. Promptly I retreated and bade my detective good-night.

But it was not night here. Through the transparent roof the morning sunshine was streaming. The sun had long been risen. Then there must have been a strike on, and the porters and wagoners had refused to take up their task until they had secured the promise of higher wages. It looked more likely. But no; the market-keepers would not have left the gates open, and the police would surely have been about. Still, not a single workman appeared.

Suddenly I heard singing, soft and sweet and increasing in strength. Someone was approaching; and then a tall matronly lady entered in beautiful apparel of white and black and gold velvet. She was evidently a woman of distinction. She was quite alone.

She passed actively amongst the flowers, delighted with their scent and beauty; but her interest did not end here. Singing as she moved about, for her heart was evidently full of joy, she turned to the cases of fruit and proceeded to explore their contents, to unpack them and arrange them for distribution. Had she engaged in this work with less nimbleness and dexterity I might have been more amazed than I was; but her action, however unexpected in a lady of high rank, was accomplished with such perfect ease and command, and she was so happily singing or humming to herself all the time, that I felt it would be only an impertinence on my part if I offered to assist her. So I kept at a respectful distance and she remained indifferent to me.

Presently I caught sight, in another part of the market, of a second and then a third lady, all dressed in style, but with fine taste, and all likewise engaged with eager industry, and singing snatches of songs the while in handling the flowers and making preparations for the sale of the apples, pears and plums and other products of the garden and orchard. Continuing on my way, I met one of the officers of the market, to whom I addressed my inquiries. His answer increased rather than allayed my wonderment. He blankly told me that none of the ordinary labourers and market porters could be found, and that as nearly all the able-bodied citizens had their appropriate business, the queens had volunteered to manage the market until other hands were available, lest those precious but perishable treasures should be sacrificed. "You talk as though queens were fairly abundant," I exclaimed; "and as for this mystery of the lost porters, do you mean to tell me that hundreds of men employed in such a public business as this could suddenly disappear without anyone—?"

But my words were in vain. He walked away without obliging me further.

* * * *

I had a dream that night—no wonder. I dreamt that all the honey-bees were dead; that the hives throughout the land had been overtaken by a pestilence which had carried off their busy inhabitants as the Great Plague had carried off the citizens of London. And then the spring came, and the flowers opened and the trees in the orchard were smothered in blossom, and in the gardens the gooseberries and currants and strawberries and raspberries were in bloom. "What a crop of fruit we shall have!" the people began to say. But the wiseacres shook their heads. "Little fruit with no honey-bees about," quoth they. And there were no honey-bees about. Then the people looked very sad. "Lackaday!" they cried; "there's no music in the air, and we shall have no apples to make dumplings for the children and no gooseberry fool." What was to be done? The Wind said he would give the matter his serious consideration, and would bustle about and disperse the pollen as well as he could; but without assistance he feared there would be a very serious decrease in the fruit harvest. Then the Wild Queen-Bees woke up from their winter sleep, and crept out of their cosy haunts and stretched their wings and legs in the sunshine, and flew round and round and knew again the joy of life. And when they heard what was needed, "We will do the work," they cried, and away they flew to the pink and white blossoms on the trees and to the little green sugary flowers on the gooseberry bushes, and they sucked the nectar and brushed up the pollen dust and sprinkled it—it was bread of life—on the lips of the little fruits-in-promise which are nursed in the laps of the flowers.

* * * *

When I woke up, I found that my dream was true. The Honey-Bees were dead, and if it had not been for the good queen Humble-Bees we should have but little fruit to look forward to this summer.

TAPLIN'S TENT.

ON the small grass plot behind his suburban five-roomed house, on the first bright day in May, Taplin set up the tent. It is the outward and visible symbol of the advent of summer. And, though there have since been several nights of frost blighting every delicate plant and denuding every fruit-tree, the tent was not taken down. While one shivered, it was a satisfaction to look at it and know it was really summer. This tent is Taplin's special contribution to creative artistry. He conceived it, designed it, wrought it by his own unaided efforts, from start to finish. It must be a delight to glance at it and know it his very own in authorship of hand and brain as well as possession, as Carlyle supposed his mason-father to feel while gazing at the bridge built by him over the Annan. Others dream; or others buy, but the creative artist turns your airy nothing into shape and gives it a local habitation and a name, and if Taplin's tent has no artistry to boast of, it has at least a shape and a name.

The name is given by Taplin's wife and is not complimentary. There is reason to fear that Mrs. T. does not always loyally follow her husband in the higher imaginative flights of his more poetic soul. She is strictly utilitarian, and does not "hold with Taplin's tomfoolery." In the more respectable suburban areas one may occasionally see a sleeping tent in which an awakened Stoic, in noble protest against the Sybaritic demoralisation of a comfortable bed and an airy bedroom, gives evidence of regenerative grace by consigning his worn body to the martyrdom of blood-sucking diptera and crawling insects and disciplinary draughts. One may also more frequently see those canvas shelters or pagoda umbrellas under which, on Singapore chairs and in tasselled hammocks, is prolonged the experiment of ascertaining how far they also serve who only sprawl and wait. But Taplin is far too busy a man to have occasion for such leisure, and his wife would not permit sleeping-out, for that she is assured would be speedily followed by double pneumonia and a requiem. What, then, you will ask, is the advantage of a tent that is never used? Your question shows your good sense, but can you not conceive the psychological effect of an arrangement, the whole rationale of which is imaginative use? Have you not a rapier hung up on your wall, or a spinning-wheel in your drawing-room, or a lyre in your boudoir, or a dramatic costume in your box-room—which you never use? Perhaps there are some things which we only use retrospectively, like our Ashanti assegai or Samoan club, or Donegal shillelagh, and perhaps there are some things we only use prospectively, like some of our easels, pianos, and Murray's guides.

To which of these two classes Taplin's tent is to be referred is difficult to decide. Is it some primitive Sheikh of the desert in him that has built it, or some dream-Taplin of wealth and leisure in a very remote future? At present there seems no other prospect for Taplin than the daily drudgery that keeps him so pale and thin and wistful. He leaves home early, with just a glance at his tent as he passes to his office work in the city, and it is very late when he returns. His wife is one of the restlessly strenuous kind who undertake spring-cleanings every other week, and ordinary cleanings in between. She would count it a deadly disgrace to be seen sitting down indolently and giving countenance to a piece of folly. When Taplin returns earlier than usual, there is too much to do in the garden to allow any repose. Besides, the cool of the evening is hardly the time to appreciate the solace of canvas walls. So the tent day by day billows in the breeze, or whitens in the sun between the glistening pole-tops, while the would-be occupant pales under a roof and swelters among ledgers in the congested city.

Perhaps there are odd moments in which Taplin, just a cog in the wheel of the industrial mechanism which hour by hour grinds out the souls of men, wings his imagination to the small green plot a few miles away, and sees the gleaming booth, and feels the welcome coolness within, whither is wafted the scent of the wallflowers and the sweet briar bush. And perhaps the heated brow is cooled and the badgered brain receives a spray of soothing nepenthe.

So that Taplin builded better than he knew when he set up the tent in which he has never sat, and which is only the sign of an unaccomplished dream. It remains the half-embodied realisation of a dream, a desire, a delight which underlies the thousand activities of all men. Somewhere on the map for all of us is a little garden close, set thick with lilies and red rose;

There comes a murmur from the shore,
And in the place two fair streams are,
Drawn from the purple hills afar,
Drawn down into the restless sea.

And in that garden is a tent, or a booth, or a bungalow, or a bijou cot, where we shall take our rest one day, and know happiness, and be at peace.

I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree,

And a small cabin build there, of clay and wattles made;

Nine bean rows will I have there, a hive
for the honey-bee,

And live alone in the bee-loud glade.

And I shall have some peace there, for peace comes dropping slow,

Dropping from the veils of morning to where the cricket sings;

There midnight's all a-glimmer and noon
a purple glow,

And evening full of the linnet's wings.

The poet who wrote those lines many years ago still lives in rooms in a horrible city, and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has not driven in the pegs to mark his allotment in Innisfree; whereas Taplin at least has a canvas tent in his back garden, though it is one in which only his heart lives, while he toils the dreary hours in the soulless city.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE NATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS.

SIR,—The interesting summary of the National Peace Congress by your Liverpool correspondent necessarily left out much that was of interest and importance. Will you allow me to mention our conference, which is not alluded to, but which dealt with a very vital part of the Peace Movement? I mean the conference on "Education and International Understanding," held on the evening of Wednesday, June 10. Miss Sara A. Burstall, M.A., Headmistress of the Manchester High School for Girls, read an excellent paper, full of wise suggestions, on "Girls' Schools and International Peace." The great hope of the Peace Movement is in right education, and very much good might be done if those who are engaged in teaching would apply to the "School Peace League," 167, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, S.W., for a leaflet on the subject.—Yours, &c.,

MARK RUTHERFORD AT DITCHLING.

SIR,—Your notes on June 20 refer to a genial little article in the Sussex Daily News of May 11. They raise again the question, were there any other Unitarian pulpits besides that of Ditchling which the Rev. Hale White (Mark Rutherford) occupied as resident minister? I think the writer of the article is incorrect in stating that Mr. White married his successor, the Rev. Alexander Macdougall; also, he never preached "in that poor little pulpit," which was not put there until about 1878, when the old high-backed pews, which some of us remember, were removed. Mr. Macdougall, who is still living, has written an account of his Ditchling pastorate in a now rare book, "The Autobiography of Allan Lorne," and his account of place and people makes pleasant reading.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

HENRY JAMES THE STYLIST.

Notes of a Son and a Brother. By Henry James. London: Macmillan & Co. 12s. net.

MR. HENRY JAMES has become a cult, and in doing so he has probably secured for himself speedy oblivion. We know that many people will hold up their hands in horror at the rashness and literary vulgarity of this statement, but we mean exactly what we say. Great literature makes its appeal to the common heart and the normal intelligence of mankind. It is expressed in language from which the obscurities of imperfect thinking and the mannerisms of self-conscious cleverness have been purged away. Its style is rich with personal colour and has in it the originality of genius; but it does not forget that the first requisite of good style is that it should be intelligible and give noble pleasure to many people. Now Mr. Henry James has certainly a style of his own, and he succeeds in giving pleasure of a rarefied kind to a small number of people; but we never heard even an ardent admirer plead that his writing is simple or easy to understand. When every allowance has been made for the subtlety of his psychology and the attempt to express the most elusive aspects of emotional experience, there is a large balance due to the account of bad writing, which is evidently a source of pride to himself and a select coterie of readers. In order to find a parallel to the ugliness and obscurity of many of his long sprawling sentences we should have to go to the worst specimens of translation from the German. Here is a sentence culled at random :

"I witnessed, for that matter, with all my senses, young as I was, the never-to-be-equalled degree of difference made, for what may really be called the world-consciousness happily exposed to it, by the prolonged 'coming-out' of The Newcomes, yellow number by number, and could take the general civilised participation in the process for a sort of basking in the light of distinction."

We submitted this volume to the test of reading it in the mood of gentle tenderness, when a great book is often the best companion. Page after page left no impression on the mind. These sentences not only lack beauty and clearness; they have no bite in them.

Having made our growl, and condemned ourselves to the unutterable scorn of the devotee, let us hasten to add that the second volume of Mr. James's leisurely narrative is a good sequel to the first. Perhaps it contains nothing quite so original as his successful attempt to recapture the actual moods and sensations of his own childhood; but the portraits of interesting people are drawn with greater fulness of detail, notably those of his own family group, his father and his brother William. The pages which will linger longest in the memory are those which describe his cousin, Mary Temple, and the impression of rare spiritual beauty which she made upon her intimate friends. Many of her letters are quoted. They are full of a radiant joy in life while death drew steadily nearer.

"I feel tired out and hardly able to stir, but my courage is good, and I don't propose to lose it if I can help, for I know it all depends on myself whether I get through or not. That is, if I begin to be indifferent to what happens I shall go down the hill fast. I have fortunately, through my mother's father, enough Irish blood in me rather to enjoy a good fight. I feel the greatest longing for summer or spring; I should like it to be always spring for the rest of my life and to have all the people I care for always with me! But who wouldn't like it so? Good-bye."

Let the reader compare these touching confessions of an ardent and sensitive nature with the intricate web of comment by which they are surrounded, and he will have the best illustration we can desire of the deliberate obscurity, which has called forth our strictures upon Henry James the stylist.

GLEANINGS FROM THE WORKS OF GEORGE FOX. By Dorothy M. Richardson. London: Headley Bros. 1s. net.

THIS little book is an addition to the Religion of Life series, edited by Dr.

Rufus M. Jones, and most welcome in its incitements to the study of Fox's Journal. The "Gleanings" are arranged in three parts, first narrative passages, more or less autobiographical, then special testimonies on such subjects as business life, oaths, slavery, war, &c., and thirdly a section on social life and general exhortations. The narrative passages are very characteristic, but as a matter of proportion rather too much stress seems to be laid on Fox's physical sufferings under the brutal treatment he received, when there is so much of more helpful human interest that might have been selected. Was it worth while to quote from the "Short Journal" the reference to the priest of the parish who "foamed like a pig through rage and madness"? And the passage from the same source about the Nottingham Sheriff is better in the big Journal. "He was walking with me in the chamber, in his slippers," Fox relates, when the impulse to go out into the market and preach repentance came upon him, "and accordingly, he went in his slippers." The opening passage also begins in the middle of the vital narrative, and surely would have been better if the first word had been of Fox's turning from all other teachers, and then hearing the Voice, which said: "There is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition." "And when I heard it, my heart did leap for joy." One other surprising omission, which we greatly regret, in such a book, is that of the early vision, more worth recording than that of the man and two mastiff dogs and a bear, which is quoted. "I saw also, that there was an Ocean of Darkness and Death; but an infinite Ocean of Light and Love, which flowed over the Ocean of Darkness; and in that also I saw the Infinite Love of God; and I had great openings." But still, the little book is full of living interest, and the misprints we have noted, and several lapses in the punctuation of passages from the new Cambridge edition of the Journal, will soon be set right, we shall hope, in a second edition.

THE FOURFOLD GOSPEL. Section II. The Beginning. By Edwin A. Abbott. Cambridge, at the University Press. 12s. 6d. net.

SELDOM has there been such a laborious retirement as that of Dr. Abbott. From the quiet study in Hampstead, where he lives hidden from the world, there comes a constant stream of books so high in the standard of their scholarship, so exacting in their attention to detail, that few people are in the position rightly to appraise their worth, much less to criticise them. His New Testament studies seem likely to rival the Golden Bough alike in copiousness of treatment and wealth of learning. If the series ever draws to a close we hope that the ordinary student will not ask in vain for a summary of final results. Here we can only note that this volume is devoted to a study of the Fourth Evangelist in his literary relation to the text of Mark. Dr. Abbott presupposes that he wrote with full knowledge of the text of the other Gospels; and that one object which he had in view was to intervene "on behalf of Mark, in order to explain harsh or obscure Marcan expressions altered or omitted by Luke (and sometimes by Matthew also)." Stated in these bald terms the thesis is likely to arouse a good deal of scepticism; but in view of the cumulative effect of the evidence and the extraordinary interest of many of Dr. Abbott's suggestions we can only advise suspension of judgment and an open mind. Generally speaking, Dr. Abbott is of opinion that while Mark reports the actual words of Christ, often misunderstanding them, the Johannine Gospel is much closer to his mind. "We may sum up," he writes, "the whole relation between the First Gospel and the Fourth by saying that, where Mark represents Jesus as saying 'the Son of Man,' and often supposes him to mean a kind of royal Deputy at the right hand of God, the King, John represents him as saying 'I,' but as always meaning 'the Love of God in me.' The Johannine meaning, though not the Johannine saying, seems historically correct. It was the Love of God, not the Sovereignty of God, that was really the pole-star of Christ's doctrine. And it is towards this star that the compass-needle of the Fourth Evangelist—amid all the labyrinthine windings through which he leads us—invariably points."

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE FAIRY WORKERS.

I.

LONG ago there was a beautiful valley through which a brook ran on its way to the river near by. The brook sang merry songs in tune with the birds who lived in the trees that covered the sides of the valley. The brook and the birds had singing competitions, and the fairies were the judges. For it was one of their best-loved dancing greens, and there they found ever so many kinds of flowers. There were clovers and woodbines from which they could suck the honey, and buttercups to hold their drink of dew, and fox-gloves—which just means fairy-folks' gloves—and poppies to make their clothes, and cowslips and hare-bells and roses to shelter them. Then, too, fine mushrooms grew there for tables, and toad-stools, for seats. Perhaps you would have been better pleased with the strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, and nuts. Altogether it was a lovely place with no one but the fairies and their friends, the birds and squirrels, rabbits and mice, to see it. But I forgot the insects. It was a very happy home for them, too.

But by and by men found the valley, and saw that it was a good place to build homes in. Then all became changed. The trees were cut down, and the turf and the flowers dug up, till the whole valley was covered with houses and full of people, and the woodland fairies and wild folk went elsewhere. Of course there were other fairies; there are always fairies where there are children, and there were crowds of children. So the other kinds of fairies came and lived in the houses with them. There were the fire-fairies, and water-fairies, and sunbeam fairies. And there were those that grown-up people call toys, but, as children all know, these are really—truly fairies, and at night they dance about the children's room.

At first the houses were built of wood. Later on men built them of brick and stone, which lasted much longer. But when hundreds of years had passed even these became so very tumble-down that the rulers of the city decided they were not safe. Then, too, they were so crowded together that very little fresh air could get to them. So it was settled that they must be pulled down. All the people had to find fresh homes, and, of course, the fairies too, for no fairy-folk could abide the noise and dust and ugliness. When the houses were gone, men cut a new street there, a very wide and straight one. This was good, but what an ugly waste was left by the side of it. The men put up a wooden wall, I suppose to keep boys from making it their playground. It would have been awkward for the passers-by if footballs and tipcats had suddenly dashed among them. So the other side of the wall lay littered with piles of broken bricks, and slates, and chimneys, and plaster, and mortar, and the dirty papers that untidy people dropped in the street for the wind to try to clear away.

Now Titania, the queen of the Fairies, had been out of this country for many years, attending to her business abroad, but, hearing there was a new king here, she decided to attend the Coronation. She came in an aeroplane made of maple-seeds and thistle-down. When the Coronation was over, she resolved to have a look at the lovely valley she had known hundreds of years ago. (You know the fairies are very old, and always young.) But when she flew over the wall she gave such a sad cry that all the sparrows woke and wondered what it was. "My poor valley," she said, "Oh, will it never be beautiful again? She flew away, but she could not forget the ugliness, and she was so sad that the diamonds in her crown became quite dull. Her sadness made all her attendants miserable, even Puck, who had become quite fond of her since Shakespeare's days. So he put on his thinking-cap to consider how matters could be put right. But I must tell you what happened afterwards next week.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MISS ALICE SARAH WORSLEY.

A PERSONAL IMPRESSION.

LONG ago Dr. Martineau, in an unrecorded speech, spoke of all that the world owes to its unmarried women. They are the "cement of society," he said. They hold the separate home-blocks together, first in the larger family group, and then in a wider union still. They are often free from continuously absorbing obligations, and can obey sudden calls, fill places in the ranks made empty by disaster—and, having given everything, are content to have no permanent counterclaim, even implicitly. Above all, perhaps, children find in them springs of uncovenanted mercies; while old people cannot come first in anyone's care at all if no unmarried daughter or niece is there to protect their infirmity, and make them a "first charge" on their energies. And when these uncertain but absorbing claims relax, the standing need of the great host of the socially disinherited is always there.

The death of Miss Alice Sarah Worsley in her 82nd year recalls these thoughts so vividly that the present scribe is forced to suspect (though he cannot convict) himself of having given them some slight turn here and there, under the direct impression of her personality. She was the eldest child of the late Philip Worsley, who was born in 1802, and of Anne, daughter of John Taylor, of the Norwich group of Taylors, Enfields, Dowsons, and Martineaus; and the traditions of Puritan strenuousness and culture kept their hold on her tenacious and faithful nature throughout her life. "The wisdom which her mother taught her" was always her stay. But though her youthful ideals and standards of right remained essentially unchanged, she never judged or condemned the world that surrounded her old age, and she retained so keen a sympathy with young life that she had no greater pleasure than that of playing fairy-godmother to nieces and great-nieces, whether by timely presents on the approach of some festivity at home, or by opening to them the delights of travel abroad.

Under her mother's tuition she had become a really accomplished artist, read Italian as well as French, and was devoted to botany. At an unusually early age (at any rate for those days), she learnt to feel at home in France and Italy, for on some alarm as to her health her mother took her in her fourteenth and fifteenth years through Marseilles to Genoa, where her great-uncle, Philip Taylor, had settled, and she only missed by one year witnessing the democratic revolt of Genoa in 1849, and the brief siege in which it ended. Her uncle had been closely engaged in the events that preceded it (on the aristocratic, but still anti-Austrian side), and Jesuits escaping in incongruous disguises, and suchlike incidents of romance and conspiracy, had for her the actuality of things that happen in one's own entourage, not just in books. These experiences naturally made a profound impression upon her, and not only made her the lasting friend of the members of this branch of the family, who afterwards settled in France, but so enlarged her knowledge and her sympathies as to give her a sense of direct personal concern in foreign as well as domestic events. Nevertheless, her subsequent years of "young-ladyship," as understood in those days, and of early womanhood ran their course of domestic uneventfulness, and the usual activities of Sunday-school work and so on, but pursued with more than the usual devotion and conscientiousness. In particular the London Domestic Mission, of which her father was one of the earliest and most earnest supporters, appealed to her sympathies.

When her only sister and two of her brothers had married there was plenty of young life round her, and before long she had herself to undertake most of the duties of a married woman, for she kept house for her father and mother, and took charge of a niece and nephew who were bereft of a mother's care. She was habitually diffident, and never sought responsibility, but her unflinching persistence of moral purpose enabled her to face it whenever it came, and would give her action firmness and decision under any crisis. And she was now practically the head of a household, for her mother was falling into ill health, and needed her devoted care till her death in 1877. Then came periods of nursing wherever the call might be, and finally, fifteen years of care of her father, who "counted the days" when she was away, and with a full heart recognised the love that made the service light. He died in extreme old age in 1893.

There were still twenty years of life left to his daughter. She was still active in good works, now chiefly in connection with the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants. Till near the end she still travelled in France, Italy, and Belgium. And more and more she became the rallying point, in whom all the members of this wide and widely scattered family connection recognised the symbol of their union and unity. There emanated from her to all of them, perhaps, in fainter or fuller measure, that vague sense of protection and mediatorship, of something that still shields us from absolute and final responsibility for our own lives, which flows out from the loved and revered presence of one of the older generation, even if in point of fact the order of dependence has long been reversed. Requiescat in pace: for peace she gave to old and young, and not least to the nieces who in the last years took the part towards her that she herself had habitually taken towards those of the previous generation.

THE following resolution was passed at the National Peace Congress, lately held in Liverpool:—"This Congress protests against the threatened expropriation and expulsion of thousands of Georgian peasants and the destruction of their vineyards and orchards in order to form a camp of 100,000 soldiers in the valley of Tiriphona, in the heart of Georgia, to the great detriment of the prosperity of that country, and in defiance of the existing treaty between Russia and Georgia; and expresses the hope that even yet the project will be reconsidered."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

CLOSE OF SESSION.

THE proceedings at the close of the session at Manchester College included the Visitor's Address and the Valedictory Service on Thursday, June 18, and the annual Trustees' Meeting on the following morning.

Of the four students leaving the College Mr. W. Harris Crook, B.A., is proceeding to Germany as a Hibbert Scholar; Mr. Sydney Spencer, B.A., is to take up the ministry of Narborough-road Free Christian Church, Leicester; the Rev. G. S. Woods, formerly a Wesleyan minister, who entered the College as a special student in the summer term, 1913, goes to Taunton; and Mr. C. P. Scott, jun., is to be in Liverpool for a time for mission work, and the further study of social questions.

The progress of the new Arlosh Hall has, unfortunately, been delayed by the builders' strike, and the roof is not yet on, but all but one of the fine open rafters of Gothic design, carved in British oak, are in position, and one can see already what a splendid addition to the group of College buildings the hall will be. It is hoped that it may be completed so as to be opened during the next College session, though it cannot now be ready for the beginning of the session in October.

The annual address of the Committee, presented to the Trustees' meeting, fore-shadows great changes in the College staff, for at midsummer, 1915, Dr. Carpenter is to retire from the principalship and from his chair of New Testament and Divinity. What this will mean for the College it will be for the Committee and Trustees next year to attempt to express, and the necessary new arrangements also remain for future consideration; but more than one speaker at the Trustees' meeting referred to the gratifying fact, which is an honour also to the College, that Dr. Carpenter is to continue his work as a teacher in the University, through his appointment (for three years) to the Wilde Lectureship in Natural and Comparative Religion. Dr. Odgers recalled the interesting fact that Dr. Henry Wilde, who is a great electrician, and is still resident at Alderley Edge, was one of five Fellows of the Royal Society present at the luncheon at the opening of Manchester College, and was a generous donor to the Building Fund. It was a striking thing that his endowments in the University should be concerned not with natural science but with mental philosophy and religion.

The record of the year's work in the College was eminently satisfactory, and the address of the Committee concluded with an appeal fully justified: "The work of Manchester College is to train strong, sincere, religious men for the Christian ministry; to give them more power and understanding in dealing with the great problems of our time; and to enable them to speak with conviction and passion of the eternal truths of religion in a way which shall appeal to the minds and hearts of the present generation. It is on behalf of this work that the Committee ask for the continued support of the subscribers to the College."

Dr. Carpenter, in responding to a resolution of gratitude and confidence, referred to the pamphlets recently published by the Bishop of Oxford and Professor Sanday as illustrating the value of the position of Manchester College, with its principle of freedom. No one who felt the significance of Professor Sanday's confessions could fail to see how great were the changes coming over the whole historical treatment of Christianity, changes which were marked even since the beginning of the present century. They saw the struggle going on in the minds of many of the clergy as to the limits of their freedom of interpretation, within the formularies of the Church. Happy were they whom no such difficulty could ever embarrass!

The resolution to which Dr. Carpenter was responding was moved by the Rev. Lawrence Scott and seconded by the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones. The re-election of Sir John Brunner as President was moved by the Rev. Joseph Wood and seconded by the Rev. E. I. Fripp.

It was announced that the Russell-Martineau prize for Old Testament studies was awarded to Mr. C. P. Scott, and Miss Emily Sharpe's prizes to Mr. J. W. Jones and Mr. Kenneth Dunbar, the latter of whom had been elected to an Arlosh Scholarship. Dr. Carpenter also announced that a former student of the College, the Rev. J. Cyril Flower, of Sale, had just taken his M.A. degree in Philosophy in the London University, and that Miss M. B. Crook, who was about to enter on the theological course in the College, had passed the second part of the examination for the Oxford University Diploma in Anthropology, with distinction in the first class. In the new session Mr. R. Philipson will be senior student.

The prizes and certificates to the leaving students were presented by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, who was in the chair, in the absence of the President. In a final word to the students Mr. Dowson exhorted them not to be too clerical. A minister, he said, should be a man among men, one of his own people. If he won their trust, his word would go home. His aim should be to be a true friend, trusted and beloved of his people. He referred to the recent addition of £50,000 to the Sustentation Fund as a testimony to the generous care of the laity for their ministers.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, in his address as visitor, made a plea for the more serious study of the devotional literature of the churches. Few things, he said, were more odious than a rhetorical prayer, and he pleaded with those who were responsible for conducting the devotions of the Church to recognise the need of serious preparation and training. They should study the art of prayer in such works as the Devotions of Bishop Andrewes, Jeremy Taylor's "Golden Grove," the Prayers and Litanies of Rowland Williams, and the great historic liturgies of the Church; whether Catholic or Protestant. Prayer was the most sacred function of the minister, and the most difficult. The cultivation of the gift was much neglected. The best form of public religious service was, in his view, that which united a settled order with a place for the free utterance of the minister; but whatever form was adopted, they needed to make a careful study of the devotional works of the past. They stood in the line of a great succession, and there was perennial value in the devotional literature of the Church. Ministers needed all the help they could get from knowledge of the words and aspirations by which the saints of all the ages had nourished their souls and quenched their thirst at heavenly springs.

Mr. Wood then gave an interesting account of some of the great Protestant liturgies, among which he felt that the Anglican Prayer Book held easily the first place; and he then noted these common characteristics of all the liturgies. They are built on a carefully planned order. This order gives the service a certain unity in variety, a unity which does not centre round the sermon. The whole movement of the service is towards God. The prayers are not addressed to the congregation, but to God. They are filled with all reverence, humility, the sense of dependence and joy of fellowship with the Divine. They achieve a certain stateliness of movement, with a certain reserve and propriety of utterance. There is no self-conscious rhetoric, no soliloquising instead of prayer. Nothing is unimportant that helps to make public worship fitting of the intercourse of man with God. Whether in the use of a service book or in the conduct of a free service, preparation was equally required.

THE VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

The Valedictory Service was held in the College Chapel at eight o'clock on the Thursday evening. Dr. Carpenter conducted the first part of the service, and the Farewell on behalf of the College was given by Dr. Jacks. They were going out, he said to the four leaving students, to carry on the work of the Good Shepherd. And he reminded them that a minister had not only to do his duty as every man had, but to a large extent he had to create his duty, and he would create it anew according to the measure of grace given to him. The purpose of the ages, he said further, centred in this—the production of a race of men who trusted one another with right-mindedness and good will. Every ideal which had worked to that end had lived and born fruit continuously in human life. That great principle looked back to the communion of saints and forward to the City of God. He exhorted them to attend to the teaching of the ages in that matter. The everlasting Gospel of the Kingdom of God spoke in the glorious language of man's confidence in man.

The Welcome into the ministry was given by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, who welcomed his brothers as happy warriors to a great adventure.

MRS. BESANT AT QUEEN'S HALL. INTERPRETATIONS.

MRS. BESANT brought the series of lectures on "Mysticism" to a close on Sunday, June 14, when she dealt specially with some of the religious beliefs which are still held, though believed by many to be irrational and absurd, and showed that a mystical meaning was enshrined within them all beneath the superstitions which had veiled it. There was no such thing as an error which endures. It is the truth that conquers, not falsehood, which has in it the certainty of death, and is against the nature of the universe. Realising this, we must, however, be patient with those who are in error. At some stages of human growth the truth is seen imperfectly by eyes too weak to face the bright light unveiled, and in looking back over the great religions we have to remember that we were once as children, unable to grasp the wider views of truth, and must not look with contempt and ridicule upon man's crude apprehensions.

Mrs. Besant then turned to some of the doctrines found in Christianity, to which she specially confined herself because that was what we wanted to understand in the West. The doctrine of hell was one which was no longer believed in by educated people, but these were only in the minority as compared with the enormous number of religiously uneducated people, and this belief had a very terrible effect upon the latter when they believed in it. As preached, for instance, by the Salvation Army—an organisation which was doing a great deal of good, especially in India, where alone among the Christian organisations it took no account of colour—it was an abominable doctrine. These men and women live self-sacrificing lives themselves, and yet they preach that God is capable of torturing people in hell for ever. The same doctrine is found in other religions—in Hinduism and Buddhism; but there the torment is not everlasting, it is temporary. In that respect the two Eastern faiths have the advantage of Christianity. In losing the idea of reincarnation, the thought that we come back to the earth for future evolution, the idea of everlasting torture as a punishment for wrongdoing found its way into Christianity. The truth underlying this ghastly doctrine is that whenever we go against the law of nature suffering inevitably follows. Pain is the sign that we have broken the laws of nature, it is the voice of nature telling us that we have blundered in our search for happiness and bliss. If we give way to certain forms of vice and try to find pleasure by using the powers and mechanism of the physical body, when that body is struck away the cravings which have been thus nourished and over-nourished, failing their natural satisfaction, will become a torment until they are starved out. Similarly with the idea of Satan, which contains this measure of truth, that by our own evil thinking we are surrounding ourselves with evil forces. Every time we think along wrong lines, or do wrong things, we are creating in our own mental atmosphere a power, an influence, that is continually pushing us into evil ways. This comes out very clearly sometimes in relation to what are called epidemics of crime or suicide. People who have eventually committed self-murder have confessed beforehand that they have felt as though someone were prompting them to destroy themselves. This strange compulsion is partly explained by the fact that when a person has committed a crime followed by death, such as self-murder, that person on the other side of death has an irresistible inclination to prompt others to commit similar deeds. That is one of the many reasons against capital punishment, and it explains why in many countries where capital punishment follows the crime of murder, murders have usually increased in number. France was an exception, but the reason why when murder was no longer followed by capital punishment in that country murders increased, was because in certain classes of the Parisian populace there was a tendency towards violence, a heritage from the ghastly days of the Terror. Murder tends to decrease, however, and not increase with the abolition of capital punishment, because the pressure from the other side of death (according to Theosophical teaching) becomes less with the diminution in the number of those who are forced hurriedly and violently out of this world.

The doctrine of salvation, Mrs. Besant continued, was one which had changed its meaning strangely in the course of Christian history. At one time it meant salvation from evil, not from what was called the wrath of God. It had a very beautiful meaning from the mystical standpoint, signifying salvation from the limitations and weakness of the flesh and the lower world, the liberation of the spirit from enslavement to matter. The mystic thought of this liberation of the spirit as of an unfolding into higher powers, age after age, through death and birth, until at last man has so developed the powers of the spirit within him that matter has no longer the power to bind him. The "bonds of the heart" are broken and man becomes immortal. In this connection they must remember that strong passions and emotions, dangerous as these may be when they are masters, are the best servants when they are obedient to the will. We cannot make a great warrior for truth and righteousness out of a mediocre man or woman. It is the man of strong passions and emotions who becomes the greatest helper when he has learned to control them. That must not be translated into the idea that we can allow the passions to master us; otherwise we shall come back life after life until we have learned that the spirit must subdue the desires of the flesh. Salvation meant that all the struggle was over, that the passions and the emotions had been turned into instruments. A man was said to be liberated or saved when he had entered into birth by compulsion for the last time, passed through the gateway of death for the last time, and had become a "pillar in the temple of my God," from whence he should "go forth no more." That is the eternal life of which the Christ spoke. And this work of the world will not be over, this globe will not pass into the chill of death, until man is ready to pass out into other and more splendid worlds.

The early Christians, said Mrs. Besant, never dreamt that man needed to be ransomed from the Father or to be saved from a God of love. They thought of Christ as going down into hell to bring back with him those who were there. Slowly a change came over the idea, and Christ was conceived as meeting the wrath of God, a conception which lasted down to the Reformation and passed into the Reformed Churches. The doctrine was traced until we reached the revolt which came in the English Church against the substitutionary view of the truth of the atonement, when men began to think of it in another way. They said that Christ revealed to God what man might be, and revealed to man the heart of God. But they did not reach the mystic view, which bids us see in Christ one who has risen to the height of perfect unity with God, and, looking down upon his brethren in the earth, sees them wearing his own body and identifies himself with them, sending down his strength, his love, his purity into the souls of men that are open to him though closed to each other, and imparting his strength to their feebleness, his purity to their foulness, his love to their hatred. That is the mystical conception of the atonement—that everyone within his limits becomes a saviour, a Christ, in sharing his knowledge, his strength, his purity with others. There is no brotherhood for us, or for those above us, unless we reach down as brothers to those below us, sharing our best with them.

SPEECH DAY AT WILLASTON SCHOOL.

A PARENT'S IMPRESSIONS.

LOOKING back on my boyhood, I feel that I cannot quite truthfully echo Lamb's words: "In my happy school-days." Far be it from me to treat with any irreverence the memory of my pastors and masters, but I fear that sometimes nature must have been mightily amused at them, as Erasmus has it, for somehow they seemed to miss the obvious fact which she, kind mother, and I, her dutiful son, thrust under their very noses, namely, that I was but a human boy.

I always seemed to be a candidate. To the ecclesiastically minded, a candidate for confirmation; to the scholastically minded, a candidate for examination; to the medically minded, a candidate for the measles; to the morally minded, a candidate for the birch. Latin and Greek so entirely predominated in my studies that I grew up under the impression that the great masters of English poetry and prose had written their works solely for the purpose of our school turning them into indifferent hexameters or idioms which went one better than Cicero. I remember one master who told us that Arnold's "Latin Prose Composition" was the Lower Fourth Bible. It was hardly an inspired scripture in his hands, for the lesson seemed a kind of burial service at the grave of this deceased language. It never seemed to occur to any but a few of these pedagogues that the real reason for reading Greek and Latin was that certain men had written such stunning good stuff in them that they were of more value than many living tongues. For instance, since those days, I have found this saying of a delightfully truthful old gentleman, who used to live in Athens: "For children are your riches; and upon their turning out well or ill depends the whole order of their father's house." These thoughts came into my mind while walking in front of the buildings of Willaston School, watching the boys playing cricket. It was a summer evening, the evening before Speech-day; and what more perfect group of figures could there be in this landscape of school buildings, green grass, and noble trees than these happy youngsters? While I was watching them they scampered off to rehearse for the next day, to sing, and to sing what ought to be for boys the song of songs: "Sumer is i-cumen in." Good old Lower Fourth Bible. At least I remember my favourite text in you: "Quot homines, tot sententiae," and my opinion is that that school is good where the boys are happy, and foretells well for the order of the father's house.

Anyone who knows boys knows that they love freedom but hate anarchy, and you may depend that where there is good order kept, where studies are well ordered, and games well ordered, and meals well ordered, school life will be wholesome and happy. And here the ordering is on the lines that boys are boys; that they have plenty of healthy morality if you get at them in the right way; and that they are eager for learning if you will kindle their imaginations. Do I not to-day remember the very face of one master who taught me to love Virgil, not for the soundness of his quantities, but for the romance and fine adventure, and the nobility of his poetry?

And when Speech-day came we passed into the gymnasium. There we heard the chairman's eulogy of the school, followed by the headmaster's report, a happy combination of modesty and wit; and after a speech from one of the Governors we listened to the songs and music. Music is loved as an art here; the songs show it, and the orchestra is really remarkable, and, taking into consideration the numbers to draw from I should think it is unique. Tea was followed by a scene from Shakespeare, done with rare gusto. Falstaff and Shallow and Silence and all those immortals trod a stage strewn with rushes, and in the open air. "Gallants, lads, boys, hearts of gold, all the titles of good fellowship come to you!" We were loth to part from them, and to know that Speech-day was over.

Of all foolish sayings, that to me is the most foolish which is so much in fashion to-day, that a man owes his education entirely to himself. As Adam Smith wisely asserted, we do not even know whether we are tall or short, fat or thin, till we are among others with whom to compare ourselves. It is amongst themselves, amid the constant comparisons going on, that boys are educated. But the standards of comparison can be false and low; and here the masters come in to control the education, for they can deftly inculcate good standards, and so produce natural and friendly rivalry for the highest things. My own experience is that boys are far more susceptible to ideas than they are credited with being; but they are unconscious of it, and to make them self-conscious is to spoil all. And artificial systems of teaching, and especially of religious teaching, do make them self-conscious, because such systems do not fit a boy's free nature, and so do not rouse his enthusiasms and sympathies.

I rejoice to think that Willaston School is making a tradition of its own—a tradition of freedom, progress, and happiness. Dogmatism is absent throughout, and order and control, sane and kind, and without shackles, everywhere apparent. Coming away, I felt thankful for a school which gives me what I want for my boy; not only sound learning, imparted in an interesting way, but an atmosphere of freedom, freedom without those perplexities which must distress a young mind when the religion of the home is at variance with the religion of the school. I have seen quite enough to make me feel how important this matter is. At Willaston there is no such variance, and I am truly glad of it.

When that noble scholar, Colet, came to certain views as to the bearing of new ideas in religion and learning on life, he founded a school; he set us an example, and marked an epoch. We have now followed the example. I venture to hope that Willaston School may mark an epoch.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE summer meeting of the Association was held at Emerson Hall, Parkstone, on Wednesday, June 17, under very happy conditions. The hall stands in the grounds of the Hermitage, the residence of Mr. and Mrs. William Carter, and from the terrace of their garden there is a glorious view over the wide expanse of Poole Harbour to the Purbeck Hills beyond. The evening was perfect for such a view, with a wonderful clearness, and it was enjoyed both from the garden and from the neighbouring brow of Constitution Hill by a goodly company of friends.

The quarterly business meeting of the Committee was held in the afternoon, the President, the Rev. H. S. Solly, in the chair, and at the opening of the meeting, on the motion of the President, seconded by the Rev. C. C. Coe, a cordial welcome was offered to Miss Spencer, the treasurer, on her return home after a winter in Egypt. At 5 o'clock a company of sixty sat down to tea in the shade of a circle of trees by the Hall, and after tea the Rev. W. B. Matthews, of Poole, who has charge also of Emerson Hall and arranges the rota of preachers there, offered a welcome to the members of the Association on behalf of the congregation and of Mr. and Mrs. Carter.

Service was held in the Hall at 6 o'clock, conducted by Mr. N. Raad, B.A., of Ringwood, and the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. G. W. Thompson, of Portsmouth, on "The Re-birth of Religion." There were two notes, the preacher said, constantly recurring in the history of religion, that of continuity or development, and that of regeneration. He referred to the various periods in the development of the history of Israel, traditional, prophetic, priestly, and then to the creative influences in the period immediately before the coming of Jesus, derived from the religions of Persia, Greece, and Rome. Of the religion of Jesus, standing in that line of development, he spoke as the soul, and of Paul's system of thought as the body of the Christianity which has maintained its life from that time to this. It had experienced many major and minor regenerations, down to that of the Salvation Army, but was now marked for death, as out of touch with modern conceptions of life and the world, and they must look for a new re-birth of religion. They were living in a new world and must nourish in their minds and hearts the thought that God was living still and would express himself in a new way, to meet the need of to-day. It was the thought of unity that held them now, a far-reaching, revolutionary idea. Life was embraced in one great whole. Man was part of the great unity of the world, and it was a good order in which his life was set. He was here, not to prepare for another world, but to develop in this world the fulness of his spiritual powers as a son of God. All knowledge, as Seeley said in his "Natural Religion," they found to be knowledge of God. He is the only reality behind all that is. He it is who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. So they were brought to the final conception of God as all and in all.

After the conclusion of the service, the Rev. V. D. Davis, secretary of the Association, expressed the cordial thanks of the members to the Rev. W. B. Matthews and the Emerson Hall congregation, and to Mr. and Mrs. Carter, for their hospitable reception.

"A DAY WITH GOD."

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

UNDER this title the Salvation Army describes some of its meetings at the International Congress. So we responded one afternoon, but found on arrival at the large temporary structure in the Strand that the building was already full, and that officers were barring further entries. Meanwhile the sound of music and the singing of a throng came to us through the doors left open for ventilation. Among the disappointed ones was a well-known Wesleyan lady, to whom the experience of being shut out was evidently a novelty. Looking about us we saw a notice: "Chairs 6d., reserved seats 1s." So although full it was evidently not a free meeting, members of the Army, presumably, excepted. We inquired if we could have a ticket, and finally obtained one. There appeared to be only one solitary seat vacant.

A vast low-pitched structure, 75 seats in a row, and perhaps 50 rows, and six aisles. At the end a platform holding about 400, also crowded. There is plenty of colour among the uniforms to give diversity to the scene. A characteristic Salvationist hymn is being sung, but if we want the words we find we must purchase a book, and our zeal does not reach that length. On the platform is a Commissioner acting as leader, a man with a large, strong face and prominent dark whiskers. When you come to the word "New," he says, hold up one hand as a sign of assent, and the crowd do so. Later on we had to hold up two hands, and then at another point wave our books. Effective as drill, perhaps, but to some minds rather repellent. This, however, was the only incident that offended our prejudices. Then we had testimonies from various parts of the globe—Canada, Australia, South America, and India, the speakers being interpreted as they proceeded. All were heard well except the last, a native Indian woman. Each address contained the note of conviction, and the matter was of a high order. God was the keynote of experience rather than Christ; "give yourselves to God," "the compelling power of God," was the burden of the testimonies. "Passionate service is the accompaniment of sanctification" was a phrase that impressed us, and another "the measure of devotion is the measure of the conscience." "Sin is to be killed as you would kill a snake, but you can't do it without the power of God" was the declaration of one speaker.

Although there was a charge for admission the collection was not neglected, and evidently the strain was felt by some of the rank and file. "We can't be always giving," said one; "the Lord doesn't expect us to unless he prompts us." And he and several "lassies," not being so prompted, left the building. Probably many others felt the same, as the plates seemed rather empty.

We went to the meeting with every desire to enter into the spirit of it, and the total result we felt to be rather disappointing. Nevertheless the Congress is a witness to something which it is possible to under-value. Here is an army of ordinary men and women drawn together not by service to one master for pay, but by consecration to a spiritual ideal. Something has entered into their lives which they did not possess before. It has altered and refined them. You can discover that by their conversation and demeanour. Moreover, it has broken down national barriers so that people of various nations find themselves at one and able to work together for a common end. That something they will tell you is God, and the possession of His Spirit has changed the direction of their lives. If we accept the statement at its face value we have a phenomenon of startling significance; if we do not we have to find an adequate explanation of it otherwise. In the former alternative much of our modern thinking is put to rout; we cannot explain heaven and earth on the basis of the self alone; man plus God will give different results to man alone. The saying that we cannot change human nature is proved to be shallow; human nature becomes changed through the action of the Spirit of God. It is easy, of course, to discover flaws, for it is difficult for our humanity to remain at a high level. The danger of cant among those who grow accustomed to use religious terms in their current speech is very real, but it is noticeably less as refinement grows, and nothing can alter the great fact of the success of the Army and the self-devotion of its members.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Blackpool.—The North Shore Unitarian Church has recently suffered another loss in the death of Mr. John Chew, one of the founders of the Unitarian movement in Blackpool, who passed away on Tuesday, June 9, aged 87. It is less than a year ago that he resigned his position as gas manager to the Blackpool Corporation, and was appointed consulting engineer to the same department. He had been the head of the gas department for over fifty years, and both as a public servant and as a citizen he was very highly esteemed and honoured. The funeral took place at the Blackpool cemetery, on Friday, June 12, over a hundred of his workmen preceding the cortège. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Councillors of Blackpool were also in the procession. The Rev. J. Horace Short delivered an address at the Cemetery Chapel, and also at the memorial service which was held in the Dickson-road Unitarian Free Church on the following Sunday.

Bolton: Walmsley.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday, June 14, in the afternoon and evening, at the Unitarian Church, by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, of Dublin. In the morning an address was given to the scholars by Mr. Alfred Pilling, J.P., of Bolton. The collections amounted to £50.

Chowbent.—The Sunday school sermons at Chowbent Chapel were preached on Sunday afternoon and evening, June 21, by the Rev. O. Binns, of Ainsworth. The morning address to the children was given by the Rev. J. J. Wright, minister of the chapel. The special singing of the children and the choir maintained its usual excellence. The collections amounted to £61 9s. 5d.

Horsham.—By the death of Miss Edith Gardner the Unitarian Church at Horsham has lost a member connected with its history by family ties, as well as by her own strong interest in its welfare. On Thursday morning, when a memorial service was held there, conducted by the Rev. J. J. Marten, her cousin (the Rev. Dendy Agate, of Altrincham) spoke in the course of an address of her gentle, upright life, the respect she had won, and her long service to the community as head mistress for 20 years of St. Mark's infant school. After cremation at Woking the remains were conveyed to Billingshurst Chapel yard, where a short service was conducted by Mr. Agate.

Ireland: Belfast.—The annual meeting of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church of Ireland was held on June 17 in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, Belfast. The chair was occupied by the outgoing Moderator, the Rev. M. Dunbar, who, in the course of his retiring address, referred to the happy completion of the effort to establish a sustentation fund similar to the one which had been raised in England. If the year of his Moderatorship had not been eventful in matters connected with their church, it would be ever memorable in the history of Ireland. Whatever view they took they must all feel that the country was in a very critical condition; that feelings had been aroused that might lead to trouble, and even if they might not lead to trouble they would not be extinguished for many a day, and their prayer was that God would so overrule things that civil and religious liberty might be maintained amongst them, and that a greater spirit of peace, kindness, friendliness, and tolerance would arise among their varied countrymen, without which peace and prosperity could never be firmly established in their island home. On the motion of the Rev. H. J. Rossington, seconded by the Rev. J. A. Kelly, the Rev. James Kennedy, of Larne, was appointed Moderator for the ensuing year. The Rev. George J. Slipper was reappointed clerk, and the Rev. J. A. Kelly reappointed treasurer. The report of the Sustentation Fund Committee stated that the fund had reached about £8,900, and that a further £1,000 had still to be raised in order to secure the £10,000 originally aimed at, but the Committee confidently relied on the generosity of the members of the church for that amount. It was announced later on that a cheque for £800 had been received from the Misses Riddell, bringing the amount up to £9,700. The report was adopted on the motion of the Rev. J. Worthington, seconded by Principal Gordon. In the afternoon the annual dinner was held in the Carlton Hall, presided over by the Rev. M. Dunbar. Subsequently a lecture on "The Atonement and Modern Thought" was delivered in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, by the Rev. H. J. Rossington.

Knutsford.—We regret that the sum realised by a recent sale of work at Knutsford was incorrectly stated in the last number of THE INQUIRER. The sale resulted in £66, not £6, being added to the organ fund.

London: Forest Gate.—On Wednesday, 17th inst., an interesting ceremony took place at the Unitarian Church, when the banner of the Martineau Lodge of the Independent Order of Young Christian Citizens was unfurled by the Rev. T. P. Spedding. The opening and closing services were conducted entirely by the children, under the superintendence of Sister Seymour. The Rev. T. P. Spedding and the Rev. J. A. Pearson addressed the children, and Sister Knight, superintendent of the Channing Lodge, spoke a few words to the parents.

Longsight: The late Mr. Charles Wright.—The Longsight Free Christian Church and Sunday school, the Manchester District Association, the Manchester District Sunday School Association, the Manchester and Salford Co-operative Society, and many others have suffered a great loss in the somewhat sudden and unexpected death of Mr. Charles Wright, brother to the Rev. J. J. Wright. After a brief illness, he passed away on Thursday night, June 18, at the comparatively early age of 57, in the very midst of an active and strenuous life. He had been connected with the Longsight Free Christian Church and Sunday school for nearly 40 years, and about 30 years ago succeeded the late Mr. John Heys as superintendent of the Sunday school, an office which he filled with great ability and untiring devotion up to the time of his death. The funeral service, held in the church on Monday last, was conducted by the minister, the Rev. B. C. Constable, in the presence of a large assembly of mourners, including representatives from the church and Sunday school, the young women's class, of which he was the leader, the Manchester and Salford Co-operative Society, and Dr. Mellone and the Rev. H. McLachlan (Unitarian Home Missionary College). The funeral took place at the Southern Cemetery, Manchester. In the course of his address at the memorial service, Mr. Constable referred to Mr. Wright's conspicuous ability as a business man, as editor for ten years of the Co-operative Herald, and lecturer for the Co-operative Society; as teacher and lay preacher. He was particularly successful as a leader of young men and women, and was held by them in affectionate esteem. He had charge of the young women's class for a considerable time, and earned a reputation as an admirable speaker to children. For many years past he had acted as umpire at the annual cricket match, Ministers v. Students. Mr. Wright was of a very genial disposition, full of brotherly kindness, always ready to give his sympathy and encouragement to the young, and it would be impossible to estimate how many lives he had helped to mould and inspire.

The new organ of the Unitarian Church was opened on Wednesday, June 17, when a recital was given by Mr. R. R. Burgess, A.R.C.O., and solos were sung by Miss Bertha Guthrie. A dedicatory service was held on the following Sunday morning, in which the resident minister, the Rev. B. C. Constable, and the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A., of Cross-street Chapel, took part, the latter preaching the sermon. The musical service arranged for the evening was abandoned owing to the death of Mr. Charles Wright. The new organ of three manuals has been built by Messrs. Wadsworth & Brother, of Manchester, at a cost of £500.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: The late Mrs. Burdon.

—We regret to announce the death of Mrs. Burdon, wife of Dr. John Burdon, and a member of the Church of the Divine Unity, which took place suddenly on June 4. She was a daughter of the late C. J. English, and in her early years was associated with Hope-street Church, Liverpool. When she came to Newcastle she at once threw herself into philanthropic work, and, in days when organisation was lacking, took an active interest in efforts to send poor and sickly children to the seaside. She gathered around her a few friends who formed themselves into a society for supplying garments to the poor in the local hospitals at Christmastide, and, mindful of the affliction which she feared might await herself, especially interested herself in late years in the welfare of the blind. Mrs. Burdon was an active worker in the local Aged Female Society. On the Sunday previous to her death she was in her accustomed place at worship.

Pontypridd.—At the outdoor demonstration, held on Saturday last, organised by the District Union, the Unitarian Band of Hope obtained second prize for the best turnout in the procession. A member of this Band of Hope has won first prize in Class C (ages 12 and 13), and another member third prize in Class A (9 and under), as the result of the South Wales and Monmouthshire Band of Hope Union Temperance Examination, held last April.

The Pioneer Preachers' Movement.—Mr. Howard Young (treasurer, Pioneer Preachers) writes from 29, Mark-lane, London, E.C., calling attention to the excellent work that has been done, and is being done, by the Pioneer Preachers' movement, and reminding us that of the £1,340 required for the purchase and alteration of the premises at Highbury-place, where the Hostel has been established, £120 has still to be raised. An appeal is made to our readers for donations towards this amount, so that the managers may be free to proceed, unhampered by debt, with the development of this promising missionary effort.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

AN APOSTLE OF PEACE.

The International Peace Movement has lost, through the death of the Baroness von Suttner, at the age of 71, one of its most distinguished and devoted advocates. Born into an aristocratic Austrian family, she was intellectually drawn towards democratic and progressive ideals, but it was not until she reached middle age that she began her splendid work on behalf of the world's peace. In her forty-fourth year she wrote the famous novel, "Lay Down your Arms," which has been read by millions of readers throughout Europe, and which, owing to its influence on the mind of the late M. Bloch, the Warsaw banker and author of the book on "War," inspired the Tsar's peace manifesto of 1898. It was the Baroness von Suttner who first made Alfred Nobel, the inventor of dynamite, a believer in international peace, and she herself was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. As a speaker she was known throughout Central and Western Europe and the United States, and had been received in audience by several reigning monarchs, as well as the Presidents of America and France.

BERTHA VON SUTTNER's other publications had less success, says the Manchester Guardian, than "Lay Down your Arms!" while "Martha's Children," a sequel to the latter novel, had the usual fate of sequels. The title of two of her essays—"The International Heart" and "Double Morality"—expressed two of her most characteristic thoughts. She appealed to every incident of suffering and heroism, such as the French mining accident at Courrières, to prove that there is a common fund of experience and good feeling among peoples which has only to be made self-conscious in order to provide a basis for the future federation of humanity. She protested continually against the difference, still upheld by too many academic persons, between the public and private ideals and codes of morality. She never invited distinction as the heretic; but she protested earnestly against the idea that the voice of peace should be silent when war had broken out, and against the ancient fallacy that we are to wait for peace until the world has become angelic, as though one should say that men are not to go into the water until they can swim.

THE INVENTION OF STEAM PRINTING.

According to the Times, the little mining town of Eisleben, in Saxony, a place with some 25,000 inhabitants, has just been celebrating the centenary of the successful application in England of the invention of printing by steam. There has been a good deal of discussion among Friedrich König's townsmen and biographers as to the most appropriate date, inasmuch as König's first patents were taken out as early as 1810. It was, however, decided that the true event to commemorate was the printing on König's machines of the Times of November 29, 1814, and the local Eisleben branch of the union of German printers has celebrated the great event in connection with its annual festival—connected in its turn with the traditional birthday of Gutenberg. The town did pious honour to König's memory at the statue which was erected some 25 years ago, and the President of the Saale district of the Printers' League delivered an admirable account of his life and work—a record of struggles and disappointments until he at last achieved his triumph in London. Eisleben, it will be remembered, gave birth and education to Martin Luther, as well as to König. It gave Luther also a pulpit, but, while it would not vouchsafe the inventive König even a hearing, it is very proud of him now.

EMPLOYMENT OF SCHOOL CHILDREN.

At a meeting of the York Education Committee last week it was shown that there had been an increase in the number of child workers in that city who are still attending school, compared with the figures of a similar report in 1912, of 68 per cent. in the case of boys and 9 per cent. in that of girls. Of the boys 187 worked more than 20 hours a week outside school hours and one over 40. Of 733 boys and girls engaged on Saturdays, 130 worked 12 hours or more, fifteen 14 hours, seven 15 hours, and one 16 hours. Ninety-six were returned as working after nine at night, for the most part on Saturdays. Twenty finished at 9.30 p.m., 41 at 10 p.m., and two actually worked after midnight. The boy who worked 40 hours was twelve years old. New by-laws were adopted prohibiting children liable to attend school for the full time from being employed for more than three hours on days when the school is open. If employment is engaged in between 6.30 a.m. and 8 a.m. or between 5 p.m. and 8 p.m. the total hours of employment when the schools are open for more than two days in the week must be limited to 30. New by-laws with regard to street trading were also adopted, the age limit for boys being fixed at 14 and for girls at 16.

"THE FATHER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS."

Many well-known friends of the peace movement gathered to do honour to Mr. Thomas Burt, the "Father" of the House of Commons, at the dinner given on his seventy-seventh birthday by the International Arbitration League. Mr. Burt's efforts in the cause of international peace and his long record of public service are well known, and, in the words of the Prime Minister, "deserve a very wide recognition." Sir Edward Grey, who proposed Mr. Burt's health, said that "no previous father of the House has ever been more loved and respected. We are not all better for our long experience of public life. Some people end restless, discontented, and stripped of many of the pleasures with which they entered the House of Commons. Others, after years of public life, find themselves wiser, riper in experience, having got rid of some illusions, but having obtained an even more generous and steadfast belief that the good in mankind is going to keep the upper hand. I have never been in Mr. Burt's company without feeling that, long as his experience has been and many as are the trials through which he has gone, he remains a convinced, unshakeable optimist. . . . In these days when we look back on years of great progress, and yet see at the present moment even more unrest and discontent than we have ever known, Mr. Burt will feel that that is no reason for depression or pessimism, that it is not that things are really worse, but that men's hopes, aspirations and expectations are greater than they were." In his reply Mr. Burt gave expression to his faith in the triumph of international arbitration, based chiefly on the growing demand of the workers for what he called "a saner and nobler civilisation."

SOLUTION OF No. 61.

1. Q. Kt1 (key-move).

Correct solutions of No. 61 have been received from Walter Coventry, Rev. B. C. Constable, A. Mielziner, E. Wright, W. T. M. (Sunderland), A. S. Rodgers, E. C. (Highbury), F. S. M. (Mayfield), Geo. Ingledew, W. E. Arkell, Rev. I. Wrigley.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

REV. B. C. CONSTABLE.—The use of the Black P at K4 in No. 61 is to stop a second solution by 1. Q. Q4. I received your second card after I had replied to you. The addition stops the "cook." It is not advisable to add men which are more or less ornamental. If you refer to almost any problem by an experienced composer you will find that there is not a single man that can be removed without destroying the accuracy in some direction. None are added for appearance, or for the sole purpose of misleading.

The Echo Mates in No. 60.—The key is 1. B. Q8; if now Black plays 1... P x P, 2. Q. R7, ch, K. Kt5; 3. B. R5, mate. If 1... Kt. Q7, 2. Q x P at A3, ch, K x P, 3. B. R4, mate. The "echo" effect is apparent if these two mates are studied together. There are other variations, but these two ideas in combination form the principal theme. Our No. 63 is quoted from a recent issue of the American journal published by the "Good Companion Club." There exists a very old MS. collection of problems called Bonus Socius, probably the earliest collection in existence. The American club is named after this quaint relic. The MS. is preserved in Italy.

The Working Faith of a Liberal Theologian.

By the Rev. T. RHONDDA WILLIAMS.

This is an outspoken and emphatic book; there is much in it which is thoroughly and inspiring Christian. . . . The value of the book lies in its moral earnestness and intellectual freedom.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ALL other news of the week has been overshadowed by the assassination of the Austrian heir-apparent and his wife. Nothing more appalling and horrible of its kind has happened in Europe since the murder of the Czar Alexander in the streets of St. Petersburg. For more than half a century the Royal house of Austria has been pursued by relentless tragedy. The sympathy of all the civilised world has gone out to the aged Emperor. Sorrow has succeeded sorrow, misfortune has followed misfortune throughout the whole of his long reign. It has been his lot to endure manifold and terrible tribulations such as mortal man has rarely known. The murder of his brother Maximilian in Mexico, the suicide of his son the Crown Prince Rudolf, the senseless and cruel death of the Empress Elizabeth at the hands of an Anarchist, and now this last catastrophe, makes a story of woe only to be matched in the darkest of Greek tragedies. It is as if some avenging Fate or Fury had dogged every footstep of the Emperor Francis Joseph with the deadly resolve to root out his family from the earth. It is impossible to surmise what will be the political consequences of this latest act of wickedness. It is almost equally impossible to understand the condition of mind that can plot and carry out so fell a purpose. How far the sins of previous generations of the house of Hapsburg are working themselves out in the innocent of to-day, the sins of the fathers visited on the children to the third and fourth generation, it would be difficult and at the moment ungracious to inquire. How far the madness of the Anarchist is due to anger and discontent aroused by generations of oppression who can say? Yet, whatever may be replied, nothing can palliate so detestable a crime. All men can do to-day is to offer their respectful sympathy to the aged sufferer who has been condemned to drink the bitter cup to its very dregs.

* * *

NOT much was known of the character, dreams, hopes, and plans of the murdered Archduke. One thing is clear, that he was a man of strong will, who was not to be turned from his purpose even by the anger of the Emperor. This was shown conspicuously in his marriage. He would not give up the woman he loved, although she was outside the sacred circle of Court caste, etiquette, and tradition. He married the Countess Chotek in spite of royal opposition, and Englishmen, at any rate, liked him all the better for it.

DURING the last few days the question of the agricultural labourer has been very much to the front. The Bishop of Oxford's declaration at the Swanwick Conference that "to the agricultural labourer was due a debt of reparation" fitly opened a gathering of representatives of the Social Service Guilds of all denominations, addressed by experts on various aspects of "Land and Labour." The speakers generally agreed that no class had been more neglected both by the Church and social reformers than the tillers of the soil. Mr. George Edwards, a son of the soil, who had worked since he was six, and whose father, receiving a wage of eight shillings a week, had been imprisoned for taking home a few turnips to feed his starving children, read a paper on "The Life of the Village Labourer."

It was the monotony, the insecurity, and the dependence of the labourer's life that made his position so intolerable. The labourer on the land was by no means an irreligious man. It was his economic position which was so terribly at fault. The difficulty of combination, the tied-house system, the hopeless outlook, all combined to drive the young adult life of the villages into the great towns.

* * *

A CURIOUS comment on this indictment was being given at the same time by the action of eviction brought by Lord Lilford against a labourer named Robinson, whom he discharged along with several other men for having joined the Agricultural Labourers' Union. Robinson has lived in the same cottage twenty-five years, and no fault is found with him as a workman or with his character. For the sole crime of joining the union he has been deprived of his work and is now turned out of his home. It is well there are not many Lilfords in the land or the nation would presently have a Jacquerie on its hands as formidable as any of those with which France was once familiar. The Lilfords have had their day, and their present representative is as one born out of due time. He ought to have lived in the thirteenth century, when he would have had the power of life and death over his serfs as well as the power of eviction. Bishop Gore may well deplore the acquiescence of the Church in the abject condition of the labourer—an acquiescence which has no word of rebuke for a Lilford and no word of encouragement for the evicted labourer.

WE are glad to note that the influence and success of the Swanwick Conference from year to year has given birth to a proposal for an International Conference "to discuss social questions in the light of Christianity." It is proposed to hold the Conference at Bale, we understand, in the autumn, and it augurs well for its success that the Rev. Percy Dearmer, D.D., is the chairman of the English Committee, with Miss Lucy Gardner as honorary secretary. Miss Gardner's services at Swanwick have contributed more than any other single element to the breadth and efficiency of this united movement of the Churches. The English Committee is taking part only on the clear understanding and agreement that the Swanwick basis of membership is accepted, i.e., that representatives of all denominations be invited. It is believed that no more fruitful source and motive of social reform can be found than in the leavening of all effort by the principles of Christianity. If the Churches of Christianity can really unite on this line much will be done to break down the exclusiveness, narrowness, and prejudice which now keep different Churches apart in opposing camps.

THE new Cardinal, of whom one can never speak but with honour and respect, and who has been congratulated on his well deserved Red Hat not only by his fellow religionists but by all non-Catholic men of learning and scholarship, on the occasion of his first speech after his elevation to the Cardinalate made some interesting references to Liberalism in religion. He quoted with entire approval Cardinal Newman's words, spoken under similar circumstances 35 years ago. Newman pointed to the growth of a spirit of Liberalism in religion as in his mind the grave danger against which the Church would have to fight. "Liberalism is the enemy." Cardinal Gasquet's comment on this was decidedly curious. "More than a third of a century has gone by since the warning by the great Oratorian, and to-day we may ask ourselves, how far have his fears been justified? Alas! the world has drifted further and further, and unless God's providence shall interfere seems destined to drift farther still from the Christian ideas upon which our present civilisation was founded." We should like to know from the Cardinal what are the particular ideas, Christian or otherwise, on which he thinks our present civilisation is founded. Does he mean that society to-day is drifting farther and farther away from the great ideas of charity, brotherly-kindness, mercifulness, humanity, peace and goodwill which are so distinctive of Christianity, or does he mean the ideas set forth in the Athanasian Creed? He speaks of there being nothing positive in Liberal Religion, no definite or dogmatic truth for the satisfaction of the intellect. On the contrary, Liberal Religion is nothing if not positive.

More than anything else Liberal Religion is a great rock in a dreary land, in the shadow of which men find rest and shelter from the fierceness of controversy and the barrenness of the dogmatic desert. More than anything it has stayed the drift of the world, especially of the thoughtful world, into sheer and impotent scepticism. It has taught thousands that there is a foundation for religion which cannot be moved in right reason and in human experience, and in the very nature of man himself. It has found its leading ideas, not in the creeds of a Church, but in the moral and spiritual teaching of the Master—a teaching which to the Roman Church appears to be quite secondary to the dogmatic developments of later days.

AND if the world is drifting away from the idea on which our civilisation is founded who is to blame? What has the Church done with the ideas, not of Augustine or Aquinas, but with the ideas of Jesus? What is the attitude of the Church to-day, as represented by Cardinal Gasquet? That of the cruel boycott. He spoke with enthusiastic approval of the action of his co-religionists in the United States who have threatened to boycott the coming International Exhibition at San Francisco if a certain person who has spoken disrespectfully of the Pope is allowed to continue his office as the representative of a foreign Power. And this in a city named after St. Francis of Assisi! It is difficult to imagine Francis boycotting even the ass which kicked him.

* * *

A GREAT many people complain of the burdens laid upon them by the claims of social reform, and if we are to believe the Spectator the world is none the better for all this expenditure and activity. It is good, therefore, to come occasionally upon authoritative statements of the value of some of the work which is being done. In an article on "Mothercraft," the Times speaks with enthusiasm of the reduction in infant mortality during the last fourteen years. To this many influences have contributed—improved sanitation, better housing, schools for mothers, maternity benefit, and other agencies. The death of infants under one year old at the end of the nineteenth century was 155 per 1,000 births. During the fourteen years that have passed of the present century it has steadily declined to the comparatively satisfactory figure of 95. In London itself it has declined to 91. No doubt much remains to be done, but so far this is an eminently satisfactory return for the labour and money expended.

THE RELIGION OF THE NEW DEMOCRACY.

BY PROFESSOR G. DAWES HICKS.

THE task that now falls to me—never an easy one, but all the harder after having attempted to fulfil it on so many occasions—is to endeavour to say a few helpful words to the men who have completed their work as students in this place, and who are about to enter upon the spheres of labour which they have chosen for their life's vocation. That we, who have watched their progress here, and who have sympathised with their struggles to gain the scholar's outlook and the philosopher's wide and luminous view, wish them every joy and happiness in their future calling goes, I trust, without the saying. They are embarking upon a mission in which a vast procession of forerunners have been engaged, and the very message they have to deliver is wrapt in the scriptures of an earlier world, so that to have spent some preparatory years in communing with the minds of the past, and in learning what these have thought on the tremendous facts of life and death, of good and evil, of man and nature, is a fitting prelude to undertaking the trust that will be laid upon them and of trying to discharge its duties faithfully and well. This, however, is no ordinary moment of our national history at which we are bidding them God-speed. The Vice-Chancellor of the University of London told the newly-made graduates the other day that they would live to see changes greater both politically and socially than any which had taken place in England since the seventeenth century. He assured them that the question of the distribution of wealth would almost entirely occupy public attention during the next fifty years, and he impressed upon them the necessity of their doing their share towards forming the minds of the men who are going to settle that enormous question—adding that "if we settle it without bloodshed it will be as much as we shall do." He referred, again, to the huge problems that are confronting us in respect to the machinery of legislation and administration. "Six hundred years we spent in delimiting and defining the rights of monarchy; in the next hundred and fifty years we tested and discarded oligarchy; since 1832 we have been testing and improving and discussing—and we have not anything like finished yet—democracy." No discriminative observer of recent events can doubt for a moment the significance of these words. Who of us really supposes that the mechanism of government can long continue as it is now? Who of us is not persuaded that the very liberty upon which we pride ourselves is on its trial and that the coming years may possibly witness its serious and inevitable curtailment? Everywhere the issue is being forced upon us—is the democracy in truth capable of bearing the strain that is being imposed upon it? Will it prove itself equal to the demands which a preponderating influence in directing the course of civilisation is reposing upon it? Devotion to moral and social ideals, loyalty to causes and to principles of far-reaching scope and bearing, disinterestedness in its methods and modes of action—all these things, and many more, are required of it, if it is to succeed, where other methods of guiding the destinies of nations have failed. Will it rise to the height of its vast opportunities and know "the seasons when to take occasion by the hand, and make the bounds of freedom wider yet"? It is hard, if not impossible, to say, but even those who most of all wish it well have, at the present moment, no little ground for hesitation and fear. There is a spirit of restlessness abroad, a disposition to set at defiance the lawful authority of those who have been selected to rule, a kind of reckless indifference towards the community or the state, in contrast with what are taken to be the interests of a class or the aims of a party; and one need not be a political pessimist, if tendencies such as these awaken in his mind feelings of uneasiness and disquietude.

The symptoms of which I speak have become too periodic in their appearance and too persistent in their drift to be any longer ignored or lightly dismissed. The Passive Resister who considered himself at liberty to treat with contempt a legally enacted law of the Statute Book, the suffragette who is willing to destroy priceless treasures of a nation's history in order to arouse attention to the plea of "votes for women," the Ulster Protestant who smuggles into the county firearms and ammunition in preparation for forcible opposition to what Parliament may decree, the huge combinations of trades unions, ready at a moment's notice to bring the industry of the country to a standstill unless the terms they formulate be unconditionally conceded—these are no trifling incidents of party warfare, but indications of underlying currents of popular sentiment which have been growing and maturing for some time past. I speak of these matters not for the purpose of foreboding impending ruin or of suggesting, as some recent critics have done, that civilisation itself is in danger. I believe no such thing. In spite of the vagaries I have mentioned, and of others which I might mention, I have not lost my faith in the democracy nor my trust in the sanity and good sense of its truer mind. It is as yet new to its task. Its faults are largely the faults of youth. It is adventurous, daring, often imprudent; it is easily enticed by nostrums, easily led away by parrot cries. It has got many things to learn and not a few to unlearn. But it is sound at heart, susceptible to generous appeals, ready to be animated by lofty and worthy ends. And it can, I am persuaded, be brought to realise the fatal error of repeating what it takes to be the vice of each of the ruling classes of previous ages—of legislating, namely, merely in its own interests. Nor is it so blind as not to be able to see that for any section or clique of persons to resort to brute violence or terrorism, in order to achieve their objects, spells in the long run disaster to popular government and contradicts the central principle of a democratic state. What the democracy sorely needs is insight into the way in which these temptations are to be avoided, and these evil methods of propaganda to be rendered futile and inoperative in a self-respecting community.

You, gentlemen, sheltered here as for a while you have been in the quiet retreat of academic seclusion, are going now to the people. If what I have been saying has in it any degree of justification, you will have plenty of work to do, and multitudes of men and women to serve. Go to them with an earnest, rational, and living conviction of the reality, the value, and the primacy of spiritual verities, and recognition and response will meet you in ample measure. Gradually but surely the toiling millions of our population will reach the consciousness that nothing can save the democratic constitutions of the future from becoming the most remorseless and unmitigated of tyrannies except the spontaneous feeling of fellowship and brotherhood amongst those who are at once the governors and the governed, and a common attachment on their part to truths and aspirations which elevate human life above the sphere of the material and the animal, and establish for it a kinship with the spiritual and the divine. No doubt the toiling millions look back upon what has been, and are convinced that for generations a dire yoke has been laid upon them which they ought never to have been suffered to bear. No doubt they are embittered by the thought that, during the period immediately preceding our own, myriads of human lives have been sacrificed to human greed, that the parasites of the race have been thriving upon the misery of their fellows. Yet they are beginning to know now, and to be persuaded, that, at last, the further flow of this older condition of things has been stemmed. Awakened, at length, to a sense of their manhood, the multitudes have found a voice. Unheeded in the past, they are going to be heard in the future. And it is not surprising that, under the circumstances, the first utterances of the newly enfranchised should be frequently those of angry protest, of scornful reproach, of extravagant claims; the surprising thing rather is the restraint, the moderation, the forbearance that usually characterise their utterances. A century of wrong is bound to engender a certain amount of retaliation. But what, I think, impresses an impartial observer as the most striking feature of the whole movement is the evident feeling that fills the minds of the populace of their present unfittedness, of their inadequacy of equipment, of their narrowness of vision, for the great tasks which they are being called upon to discharge. They feel that the best that is in them is at present thwarted and obstructed, and that they themselves are not sure of it. Their lives appear to them to be lost and frittered away in little things. They are tied down, like Gulliver amongst the Lilliputians, by innumerable tiny and invisible threads, and although the outer cords that bound them are cut, they are not yet free. Others are at liberty to follow the Grail, as thinkers, as artists, as scholars, but they are not. Their souls are too often cribbed, cabined, and confined; they are uncertain of the light they ought to see and of the ends they ought to desire.

Here, then, for you, bearers of the Christian Gospel, is at once a mission and a glorious opportunity of proving that the faith you cherish can meet the needs—the large and crying needs—of the present age. With his unerring insight, Matthew Arnold declared long ago that "the difficulty for democracy is how to find and how to keep high ideals," and once again that difficulty is being illustrated to us on all sides. A free society requires beyond all else to be conscious of the infinite environment in the midst of which its freedom is to be developed. Its freedom must be a religious freedom, and not simply a political one. And this means that superstition must give way to knowledge, that love must cast out fear, that the bondsman must become a son, and God a Father. The thought of a spiritual and eternal community of human beings in the Divine Paternity, the conception of all men as brothers which follows upon that thought, the assurance that we are not as a race of summer flies who are to perish in a few brief days—these convictions are the foundation of all noble and enduring democracy—the only foundation upon which the great political principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity will ever in the long run be able to stand. And to lead ordinary men and women so to believe in God, that they may gauge to some extent the infinite possibilities of human nature; to kindle their imagination so as to enable them to know at first hand the problems of the individual soul, to love and understand its good, and through its good to conquer its evil; to reveal to them the vast travail of the race working out, through sin and sorrow, the new humanity that is to be; to point them to the root ideas on which a thinking, feeling, aspiring mind is reared, and to which all the amazing variety of its activities can be referred—such is the function that falls to-day to the Christian teacher, and for its efficient discharge nothing short of complete self-surrender to the faith he holds dear will indeed suffice.

A Christian teacher, I say, and I have said so advisedly. For it does seem to me that if the tremendous ideas of which I have been speaking—the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the immortality of the finite soul, the supremacy of love—are to be presented with all the persuasive power with which they are capable of being presented, they require to be embodied for us in a human personality and in his life and death; in one of ourselves, to whom we can look up as the leader of our pilgrim-troop into the ways of peace and blessedness. Say, if you will, that God can never have been without a witness of Himself in the minds and hearts of men. I grant the contention to the full. I believe him to have been the stay of the martyr for Buddha no less than the stay of the martyr for Christ. I believe that the calm reflection of Greek philosophy was part of his method for the education of the human race no less than the rapt utterances of Hebrew prophecy. Yes; I yield to no one in my admiration for the sages of classic antiquity and for the saints of civilisations other than our own. But we, who have been nurtured in the conceptions and ideals of a great tradition, we who from earliest childhood have caught the accents of one voice and have been drawn in tenderest affection to the feet of a common master—we cannot forget the rock of which we were hewn nor the pit out of which we were digged. We speak the language of Palestine, and its words of hope and wisdom come home to our hearts as no other words can. If we are able to stand alone and fearless in the Eternal Presence, it is Christ who has brought us there. If, in any imperfect way, we have attained to the level of divine sonship, it has been in and through the strength of his spirit, by the inspiration of his life and character. And recognising this, as we all do, why need we be concerned to question the orthodoxy of those who can no longer accept as the authentic guarantee of Christ's authority the miraculous pre-eminence that would remove him from the fellowship of mortals? The divinity of Christ may be a fact, and a stupendous fact, even though no supernatural efficacy ever issued from him; he proved himself to be the Son of God, not by changing water into wine, nor even by raising Lazarus from the dead, but by converting the sinful into the saintly, and by shedding the light of an immortal hope upon the transient years of our earthly lot.

Our discipleship to Christ has, in short, nothing whatever to do with any metaphysical doctrine we may entertain concerning his precise relationship to deity. Suffer me here to use the glowing words of a distinguished modern theologian in order to make clear what I mean. "Jesus may," he says, "have been greeted at his birth by pæans of angels, or simply have sprung, as other men, from the pure wedded love of two human hearts. Jesus may have risen radiant from the baffled tomb, or for him, as for other men, the sepulchre may have proved relentless. I, for my part, hold him no exception to the rule the wise man laid down of old, 'All men have one entrance into life and the like going out of it.' But though no choir of angels greeted his infant cry, though no portent of rent veil or lowering darkness marked his last dying cry, though nature yielded to his hand no manner of obedience, she will not yield to men of common clay, though gem after gem be torn from the garland of shining myth that decks his head, and only the wreath of thorns be left pressing on his throbbing brow; yet to have in us for one moment pure and strong and full that kingdom of God that found lodgment in his soul, would be to have risen above every orthodoxy on which the church has built her pride and every heresy against which she has plied her scourge. I know not the details of this man's days, I have no means to lay down any dogma about his sheer impeccability. How should I? I doubt not, motions of human weakness shook even his incomparable spirit. But I do know that could this race of striving, struggling, sinning, sorrowing men rise to the height of his superb and gracious manhood, and touch the glory of his communion with the Father, that would be the coming of the New Jerusalem more nearly than any other thing that I can dream of." Gentlemen, if there be any stronger testimony than that which is here borne to Christ's divine sonship, I confess that I, in my wanderings through the mazes of doctrinal theology, have never yet succeeded in finding it. And what I would urge upon you now is that it is a reverence for Jesus such as is thus evinced which will impart to your teaching the fervour and the vitality it must have, if it is to touch the hearts and hallow the affections of the men and women of the new democracy. They need an exemplar in whom all that is august and tender and beautiful in humanity is collected and harmoniously blended and made manifest. And the personality of Christ, living a life entirely holy, "native to heaven, yet blossoming on earth," and dying in simple trust and pure obedience to the Father's will, "loving nothing but what is dear to God and severe only to the guilt that is beneath his frown,"—such a spirit will bear down upon them, across the centuries, with a force and convincingness which neither the whispers of the natural heart nor the thunders of a supernatural revelation can ever exercise or wield.

Does the fish soar to find the ocean,

The eagle plunge to find the air—

That we ask of the stars in motion

If they have rumour of thee there?

Not where the wheeling systems darken,

And our benumbed conceiving soars!—

The drift of pinions, would we hearken,

Beats at our own clay-shuttered doors!

The angels keep their ancient places:—

Turn but a stone, and start a wing!

'Tis ye, 'tis your estranged faces

That miss the many-splendoured thing.

But (when so sad thou canst not sadder)

Cry;—and upon thy so sore loss

Shall shine the traffic of Jacob's ladder

Pitched betwixt Heaven and Charing

Cross.

Yea, in the night, my soul, my daughter,

Cry,—clinging Heaven by the hems;

And lo! Christ walking on the water

Not of Gennesareth, but of Thames!

That, then, is the essence of the Christianity you are going to carry to the seeking anxious minds of the present time. Am I asked, in conclusion, what profit or advantage will in the long run accrue to the faithful and humble servant of Christ, who, in the manner I have been indicating, spends himself and is spent in trying to promote and to extend the influence of the Gospel? The industrious tradesman or lawyer or medical practitioner may look forward to securing as a result of his toil some years of leisure and freedom in which he may rest upon his oars, and enjoy the pleasures that fall in his way, and even the man of science or of letters may nurture at least the hope that recognition of a public kind may perchance crown his efforts to increase the sum of human knowledge. As the culmination of your labours, I dare not hold out any such prospects as these. Society is not seldom a stern taskmaster, and often persists in repaying those who have been its most eager and zealous representatives in the coin on which they have set chief value. And you—you who have dedicated yourselves to the ministry of Christ—must not repine at assuming the yoke of Christ's service upon the terms on which you will be recommending to others the acceptance of his message. Will you not tell your people that trust in God is its own most precious reward, that "the richest joy that love can bring is more love, deeper love, love that grows with what it feeds upon"? Be prepared, therefore, to adopt as the method by which you will test the success of your own personal endeavours the same high principle of judgment. It probably will not fall to the lot of any one of you to catch the ears of crowded and spell-bound congregations, nor to draw down upon yourself your country's admiring gaze. But if, in course of a humble ministry, it be your good fortune to hear, perhaps from some wandering emigrant in the wilds of Australia, that your words have come back to him in the bush; or if some poor sempstress at her work, in the dingy alley of one of our smoky cities, confesses that but for your faith in Christ and goodness she would have sunk into the depths of misery and despair—you will not want more; you will thank God and be content. For you, witness such as that should be a rich reward. It should fill your heart with the peace that may rise often to the sense of jubilant triumph. It should give to your will, whenever in your inmost soul you realise its meaning, the power to believe in the right, and to be convinced of the supremacy of goodness in the economy of the universe. It should be to your whole manhood, and to every part of it, a consolation, a confidence, and a strength which no other experience in this world is able to supply. For, however much around you the voices of criticism, of disapproval, and of cynicism may rage—and these are never likely wholly to be silent—this is the assurance, the priceless assurance, that to you has been vouchsafed a measure of the Saviour's spirit, and that you have won a place in that immortal company of the world's benefactors of some of whom the poet tells:—

"Aye, unto these distributeth the Giver

Sorrow and sanctity and loves them well,
Grants them a power and a passion to deliver Hearts from the prison house and souls from hell."

AMONG THE MOUNTAINS OF SINAI.

To break new ground is an urgent intention in the mind of the present holiday-maker. Mr. M. J. Rendall, of Winchester College, accomplished this to good purpose when he devoted his Easter holidays to a trip amongst the mountains of Sinai described in a recent book. Not that even his enthusiasm is likely to divert the stream of spring tourists from the Riviera to Rephidim. But it is rendering a very real service to the student of the Bible to add to the testimony of Palmer, Stanley, Petrie, and others so vivid an account of personal observations that the solemn traditions of the Exodus are thawed into life again; and the murmuring Israelites, throwing off the trappings of legend which had disguised them almost beyond recognition, troop into view as inevitably as the Towara Arabs of to-day.

The orthodox route to Sinai is to follow in the footsteps of Moses, a camel-back journey from Suez of over 300 miles, subject, for the greater part of the way, to the rigours of a monotonous desert and the sweltering miseries of breathless mountain valleys. There the traveller must assuredly recall the sorrows of those ancient fugitives with nothing but sympathy, and he is not likely to be far on his way before he, too, exhibits symptoms of regret and longs for a less exhausting lot. This tedious campaign may, however, be reduced to but a few hours broiling by pursuing the route adopted by Mr. Rendall, and taking steamer from Suez to Tor, the quarantine station on the Gulf for the Mecca and Medina pilgrims. The medical provision there for the latter is admirable; the international and mainly British staff of doctors and nurses holding the pass in and out of the desert, and allowing none of the annual host to proceed without being thoroughly cleansed and disinfected, both in body and clothes.

At Tor one is within two days' journey of the Convent of St. Catharine, while a few hours' ride across the Ga'a, the burning belt of desert, brings us to the foot of the mountains. The track turns into the Wady Hebrân, one of the two passes from the south. Henceforward the way ascends to five or six thousand feet, and still the imposing summits tower far above. On every side the scenery is wildly romantic and awesome. Huge rocks suggest the walls and pylons of Egyptian temples. The architecture of the Pharaohs grew, surely, out of its own earth. At their feet the mellow green of broom and camomile plants is, in spring time, covered with white and yellow blossoms. The effect of this carpet colour against a background of rosy pink, the prevailing tint of the granite mountains, is said to be very lovely. In other parts, especially at higher elevations, vegetation is absent, but the mountains are themselves the flowers in their arresting glory of amethyst and crimson, vermilion and orange and green porphyry. The furnace which guards the highlands from the coast affords no indication of the exhilarating climate there. As late as March the monks are sometimes snowed up in their convent, and the traveller is advised to take warm clothing. Pierre Loti thus found himself a prisoner amongst the saints, shivering in his Bedouin costume. Mr. Rendall, better advised, clad in Harris tweed, found "every hour a delight" in the buoyant atmosphere.

The controversy is not yet closed, nor, perhaps, ever will be, as to which of the two mountains Jebel Serbâl with his five crowns, or Jebel Musa, "the Invisible," is entitled to the honour of the giving of the Law. To debate the incident at all is an anachronism. The tabernacle with its elaborate trappings and ritual is a reflection, and not the prototype, of the temple. Both heights have obviously from an early age been regarded by the inhabitants as holy mountains. With the arresting grandeur of Serbâl we associate as a factor of great importance to the tribes the fertile Wady Firân at its feet; the only oasis, apparently, in which a host could pitch camp successfully, and for which, therefore, Israel had to wage hot battle with Amalek, that is, the native Arab clans. In later ages Christian monks and hermits found an effective retreat from the world amongst these lonely ranges. But they were not safe from interference by the Bedouins. To escape from this nuisance they were compelled to shift their retreats, and—for such is the way of the East—would not hesitate on these occasions to carry their pious associations with them and transplant them into fresh soil. Finally, Justinian erected the fortress-monastery on the slopes of Jebel Musa, 5,000 ft. above sea-level, and there some three or four hundred monks found a refuge safe from any more serious attacks than occasional volleys of stones flung into the enclosure from the neighbouring cliffs. Their number is now reduced to about thirty. Their indolence moved Professor Palmer to nothing but disgust. The later visitor sums them up more genially as "ignorant, but kindly old fellows, hypocrites by fate rather than by intention." The massive walls of their retreat offer a welcome refuge to the adventurous explorer, while in the past they have effectively, if unintelligently, treasured some of the most precious manuscripts in existence.

And the mountain fastness of the Arabs is not to be invaded at random. It was at their hands that Edward Palmer lost his life, though it seems generally agreed that the Sinaitic clans are the best of the Bedouins. A great peril also awaits the unwary in the "Seil," or sudden flood which sometimes proves disastrous to the natives themselves. When rain falls on these bare and unabsorbent rocks, every drop slides down into the valley, so that in an incredibly short time a tranquil scene, an encampment or pasturage for flocks, is converted into the channel of a deep and raging torrent which carries everything before it. Within a single hour the storm has come and the sky is clear again, but a river has meanwhile appeared as by miracle, and ill betide any living creature that stands in its course. The Arabs declare that the narrow gorge of the Sigiliyeh which "drains all the seaward front of the immense Serbâl cluster," is sometimes filled from top to bottom with the torrent to a depth of more than 400 ft.

The author reminds his readers in an appendix of the luminous hypothesis by which Professor Flinders Petrie reduces the Biblical story of the Exodus to a credible narrative. The fundamental difficulty lies, of course, in the enormous numbers of Israelites who are said to have participated in the flight from Egypt: 600,000 fighting-men, besides women and children—a total of, say, three millions. Impossible anywhere in the world an expedition of such nature and proportions would be specially unthinkable between Goshen and Sinai. Professor Petrie pointed out in the volume of his "Researches" in Sinai some years since, that the word alâf which is used in Numbers in stating the census of the tribes on the march, may be translated either "thousand," or "family," and that in this case it ought to be translated in the latter way. Thus, Manasseh, instead of being 32,200 fighting men, is 32 tents or families comprising 200 souls. Ephraim, instead of 45,500, numbers 45 tents with 500 men. Estimated in this way the fighting strength of Israel amounts to 5,550 men and youths, say, twenty odd thousand souls in all. This is a number that may be reckoned with. For, in the first place, it is an appropriate agricultural population for the Land of Goshen; whereas three millions would have covered the whole of the Nile Delta. Moreover, the management of a host of these reduced dimensions may be admitted as a possibility. Then, by and by, occurs the collision with the Amalekites, who, being the resident inhabitants of the peninsula, concentrated their clans and threw their whole force in the way of the invaders. It was a fight for life. Sinai is only capable of affording support for a limited number of persons. What this was in the time of Moses may be fairly estimated from the present census of the region. From five to seven thousand Arabs with their families is the population now, and Professor Petrie considers that there is no reason to suppose that, owing to a diminished rainfall or other causes, fewer people can find a living there to-day than was the case 3,000 years ago. If anything, the indications seem to point to an increased humidity, with, of course, a proportionate fertility. At any rate, the desperate encounter on the plain of Rephidim leads to the conclusion that the opposing forces were about equally matched. This, therefore, confirms the view that the fighting men of the Hebrews numbered from five to six thousand men.

Mr. Rendall calls Sinai "the best desert in the world." No other desert surely can be half so captivating, whether on account of its historical associations, its wild, romantic scenery, or, in spring-time, at any rate, its exhilarating climate. Moreover, it is proved that, conditions favouring, and apart from the journey from London to Suez, a tour of breathless interest can be made within a fortnight from start to finish. But without doubt Mr. Rendall's caravan moved under a propitious star.

LIVING GREEN.

AWAY back in the early seventies many religious observances were in vogue that seem now to have fallen into disuse. Family prayers and Bible-reading are no longer the universal custom in well-ordered households. And doubtless there is good and sufficient reason for this change of habit, and it is not to be taken as implying any weakening of religious feeling.

But for some elderly people who can look back so far, there are pleasant memories connected with these gatherings which nowadays would perhaps be found somewhat irksome. Thus, on Sunday evenings, in an old-fashioned country home, too far from a place of worship to attend more than once in the day, there would be the Psalms, chapters from Old and New Testaments, prayers and a sermon. This last was something of an ordeal. One of the children read it aloud from a book propped up carefully so that Father, whose hearing was not so good as it had been, could look on at the same time. After this came the hymns, which everyone enjoyed in that comfortable old parlour, spacious and not undignified by reason of its very simplicity, dimly lit by homemade candles set in heavy old silver candlesticks. The Mother played the accompaniments, often adding a tuneful second. The piano was old and not always in tune, yet did she contrive to call forth harmony therefrom; as indeed she did from most things in the daily round. Each person might call for a favourite hymn. Father's was always the same: "There is a land of pure delight," and one can see him still, with head thrown back in his big chair (he was an invalid for years) and eyes raised with a rapt, exalted air, listening to these words that went swingingly to the fine old air, "The Hardy Norseman's Home of Old." We were not critical then; and he had long passed into the Silent Land, away from these things, and the fields amid which he loved to meditate like Isaac of old at eventide, before we began to wonder whether the endless day, the everlasting spring, the never-withering flowers of which we used to sing so artlessly did really furnish conditions so much to be desired. For we smile now, and say that change is of the very essence of joy; that we should surely tire of anything fixed and unalterable; that without shade even sunshine lacks beauty, and so on . . .

But what we do know! and were we not wholesomely rebuked once by a good old ploughman to whom in youthful arrogance we propounded some such difficulty, by being told that "Sure in Heaven won't we all be transfigured, Miss Letty?—not the same at all as what we are here, nor not wanting the same things we'll be, once we're in Paradise!"

So let us not carp at the words the old hymn-writer employed in some of his lines, but thank him for such as those in which he tells us of the Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood, (that)

Stand drest in living green. . .

Sweet fields, indeed! calm and pleasant. Does not George Eliot speak of the "luxury" of being able to walk out amid real fields, I think in Surrey, perhaps after what she writes of as a "melancholy breakfast in bed"?—and one would fain hope that the quiet, homely scenes she loved to wander among may have done something to charm away the clouds that used to descend upon that great mind.

Fields! They are always beautiful, I think; whether pasture grazed over by the gentle-eyed cattle, who wander to and fro from dawn till dark, slowly, contemplatively munching the fresh grass; or a meadow where hay is being made, sun-burnt and fragrant, or corn being saved; or, best of all, a tillage field, where one may watch that most ancient, most honourable of crafts being plied, ploughing, to wit. To see the soil being slowly slowly turned the horses stepping onward with that noble patient obedience to the rein held in a hand that looks so small, so weakly in comparison to their own magnificent form and strength; then the many processes necessary before the seed is cast into the ground; the waiting in trust . . . surely of all callings, a farmer's has most "call" for faith, he is so utterly dependent on many conditions quite beyond his control.

Yes, the field is at all times a beautiful sight. The brown, generous earth, even before it shows sign of the life stirring within, is of such a rich hue, suggestive of coming plenty. Above it wheel and soar great flocks of rooks and sea-gulls; graceful winged farmers they, who do so much to aid us poor human workers by making their living from the things that unchecked would destroy our hopes. Around one such field trees were planted fifty years ago; north and south are rows of pines, with their plummy sombre boughs held well aloft on ruddy stems; east and west run lines of beech; and these suggest "living green" perhaps more than any other tree of them all. For the foliage of the beech has a peculiarly bright, light, dancing appearance; the leaves are so silvery and a trifle crumpled, and set on branches so slender. Mr. Yeats makes his King Goll murmur of them:

They will not hush, the leaves a-flutter round me,

The beech leaves old . . .

Of all trees, yes, the beech may most truly be described as of "living green." But the words may be applied to many and more lowly growths; and they are all lovely! even a bunch of newly-sprung nettles is not without its charm, with its stems of a ruddy hue, its flowers graceful and feathery. There is a springing life everywhere observable early each year. Spring brings a renewal of a miracle that only fails to awaken wonder because we are so familiar with it. And most interesting, most appealing of all, is the veil of growth with which the earth veils herself as the seed begins to show; the tender shoots at first almost imperceptible, but which hour by hour, in sun and wind and rain, by day and by night, increase and multiply—the "living green" that promises the food supply for all living creatures, and that renews itself every year in the sweet fields of the quiet countryside.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

THE DECLINE IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

I.—THE FACTS.

It is an acknowledged fact that of recent years there has been a marked decline in Church membership and attendance at public worship generally. The Unitarian body does not publish annual statistics of membership, and my own acquaintance with the body is too short to afford any adequate data for forming an opinion as to how far we are affected by this decline. The figures of the Anglican Church, based on attendances at Easter communion, confirmations and baptisms, do not afford any exact criterion as to the condition of the Church. But most of the Nonconformist bodies do publish exact annual statistics as to their membership, and I avail myself of these as indications of the general trend of things.

Figures are notoriously fallacious, and may be made, by judicious quotation, to "prove" almost anything. Yet they may be useful as illustrations, in spite of their vagaries. The latest figures that are accessible are those for 1912-13, and these I take from one of this year's books of reference. During 1912, then, the four largest Nonconformist bodies all report decreases in their Church membership, as follows:—Wesleyan Methodists, 593; Primitive Methodists, 839; Congregationalists, 1,940; Baptists, 2,613. Their Sunday-schools report similar declines:—Wesleyans, 2,772; Primitives, 2,935; Congregationalists, 2,787; Baptists, 4,924. The next largest body, the Calvinistic Methodists, though it is able to report an increase for the first time since 1906, of 285 Church members, has lost 1,945 Sunday scholars during the year. And the much smaller English Presbyterian Church, though its loss of members is only 65, has lost 2,252 Sunday scholars. So that, taking these six denominations together, there is on these six alone, in a single year, a total loss of 5,765 Church members and 17,615 Sunday scholars. Most of the smaller bodies, whose figures I have been able to get at, tell a similar tale, with one or two remarkable exceptions. The Society of Friends, for instance, increased its Church membership by nearly 6 per cent., and its scholars by 5 per cent.; and the Moravians, quite a small body, show increases of Church members 20 per cent., and of scholars 24 per cent.; that meaning in each case the addition of more than 1,150 Church members and 1,250 scholars during the year.

To base any important conclusions upon these figures for a single year would be to fall into serious error, no doubt; but that these figures are not merely exceptional, but part of a continuous decline is shown by the figures of the two denominations for which I have obtained exact statistics for several successive years. Thus the Congregationalists' losses during the past four years have been 1,587, 1,700, 381, 1,940; an average of 1,400 per annum. The Baptist losses during the same period were 3,775, 2,500, 101, 2,613; an average of 2,250 per annum. To go back over a yet longer period, or to refer to other bodies, would be, I believe, to see the same thing repeated on a more extended scale. That there is a decline, fairly steady, and continuing for a period of years past, is a conclusion that I fear there is no avoiding.

II.—THE CAUSES.

The causes are many; they are not easy to analyse, and they combine and interact with one another in such curiously complicated fashion that it is difficult to arrange them in any sort of logical order. Some of them are local; some affect one class in the community alone; some are more general, affecting all classes though in different ways. I mention but one example of the local causes, namely, the Welsh Revival of 1905. Very large numbers were added to the membership of the various churches in Wales as a result of that revival, and they have been losing them ever since. Much of the decline of the Baptists and Methodists is to be accounted for as the aftermath of the Revival. The unusual stimulus of that time has had a very pronounced reaction, and it is doubtful whether on the whole it has not done more harm than good to the churches.

I pass then to the more general causes. It has been usual to distinguish, roughly, three classes in the community: the cultured and leisured class at the one end, the working class at the other, and in between the large and vaguely defined middle class. Of these, the upper class has, speaking generally, regarded church-going as largely a social function. It was good form to go to church, once at least—it was the fashion. And now the fashion, as fashions will, has changed. The working class have given the church the go-by long since. The Daily News census of the London churches (taken in 1903, or thereabouts) showed that only 3 per cent. of the working classes of London went to church even once on a Sunday. I believe that the provinces may yet be able to tell a better state of things. But (again generally speaking, and not overlooking the many exceptions to the general rule) the working class as a whole have long since decided that the church is of no concern to them. They look upon it as a sort of convalescent home, in which very great attention is given to the wealthier patients, or as a comfortable religious club, just a little too respectable for them.

For a long time past the middle class has provided the bulk of the clientèle of the churches. And one significant feature of the social changes of our time is that that class is slowly but surely tending to disappear. The small trader is being edged out by the big emporium, or the company with multiple shops. The smaller independent manufacturer is being swallowed up by the limited company, the combine and the trust. The old division into three classes is becoming gradually a division into only two classes, the Haves and the Have-nots. The rich are getting richer and more numerous; the poor are (relatively, if not actually) getting poorer, and much more numerous; the middle class are disintegrating. And as they pass either upwards or downwards into one or other of the two remaining classes they tend to fall into the habits, already fairly well marked, of the class they pass into.

Within each class, again, we must note various divisions and make important distinctions. The thoughtful and intellectual keep away from the churches because in them they find much that is weak and not seldom unethical, obsolete dogmas and sloppy sentiment. They prefer to read Nietzsche, or the latest problem novel, or to see a Stage Society play. And they lump all the churches together, without discriminating to any extent the comparative few that are rational and ethical and up to date, and that offer a living faith for the age. The less intellectual may spend their time in reading their Sunday paper, do a little work in the garden, or visit their friends. The more frivolously inclined seek pleasure. There is a manifest tendency for our Sunday to approximate more closely to the Continental Sunday, due no doubt in very large measure to the increased intercommunication with the Continent. Sunday concerts and plays are available, cinematograph shows, art galleries and museums are open. The parks and open spaces call some into the fresh air, the country calls others further afield. Increased travelling facilities place all these things within reach of everyone as never before. The wealthy have their motors, and can go for a week-end out of town, often to be far away from church, and disinclined to interrupt their holiday to go to one. The less wealthy have now innumerable Sunday excursions and outings by tube, tram, and motor omnibus such as were unknown ten years ago. And to many people Sunday is the one day, outside of Bank Holidays, that ever offers the opportunity of a whole day's outing.

Apart from all this outside competition, there is a good deal of inside competition also. Those who want some form of religion may seek it in Christian Science, in New Thought, in Spiritualism. Even within the churches there have arisen other services that compete with the usual public worship. The adult schools, for instance, 1,900 in number, and with 100,000 members. And the brotherhoods or P.S.A.'s, 2,000 in number, and with a membership of 600,000. The latter in particular offers the advantages of the church without any of its responsibilities. It is free and easy, applause is permitted; it is cheap; it offers the benefits of slate clubs, coal clubs, and other benevolent funds. The church in which it meets is supported by others. I have often heard ministers complain that the P.S.A. has proved no help to their church. It took what it could get, but it did not shoulder the responsibilities of the church; it got its religion on the cheap.

Again, there is to-day a great deal of moral enthusiasm expended outside of all the churches. Such causes as Women's Suffrage, Socialism, and so forth, absorb a great amount of moral energy that would otherwise go to add to the effective forces of the churches. The energy is all there, but it is directed into other channels, because the supporters of those movements feel that the churches are not vitally enough concerned with these things. On the other hand, it would be folly to ignore the fact that there is also a slackening of moral enthusiasm. There is a manifest tendency to frivolity, an increased desire for luxury and ease; there is a restlessness and dissatisfaction. There is also a distinct aversion to undertake responsibility such as is involved in church membership. It is a responsibility, and it is costly, especially so in a small church. There is a constant demand upon the powers of the members for this, that, or the other object. The church seems to be always begging for something. Worse, perhaps, than all else is the obvious fact that for many thousands of people there is no need felt for the church and its worship. They remain satisfied without it, or else go unsatisfied.

There are many other causes one might mention; many more, doubtless, of which I am ignorant. The condition of affairs is one deserving of the most serious consideration. But there is no occasion to despair. Mankind is incurably religious. The eclipse is only temporary. The question we must ask ourselves is this: are our church organisations and methods, our forms of worship, our style of preaching and teaching the right ones?—Do they suit the requirements of to-day as they did those of the last century? If not, how can they be altered to meet the changing needs of our changing times?

THE MYSTERY OF FORGETFULNESS.

SIR,—The interesting review of "The Psycho-pathology of Everyday Life" in your issue of June 20 must have attracted the attention of many, and caused them to wonder whether Freud has really found the secret of those mysterious sudden spasms of forgetfulness to which we are all more or less subject. So far as can be done in such brief compass your reviewer gives an excellent idea of Freud's theory. It is a theory which probably no one will accept at first encounter. It is only after months, or perhaps years, of study, combined with very considerable practical knowledge of the work of the subconscious in determining mental processes, that one realises the immense amount of truth that there is in Freud's contentions. Whether some of his generalisations are too sweeping is at present a hotly disputed question which time alone can settle.

Meantime, there are two points where we think the impression your reviewer gives of Freud's doctrine calls for comment. The first is his reference to "Freud's tendency to regard every suppressed complex as sexual in tone and character, and the consequent implication that the reservoir of our subconscious self is decidedly thick and muddy." Now Freud's use of the term "sexual" is extraordinarily wide. Within this term he includes practically the whole region of our affections, our emotional life in relation to others. He attributes to the sexual impulse activities and emotions of early childhood which arise in what is almost universally regarded as a pre-sexual age. Here he is probably right, and if so his teachings are of enormous importance from the point of view of education.

Dr. Leslie Mackenzie has recently said in an introduction to one of Freud's works, "That the emotions of sex should play an enormous part in the processes of analysis is to be expected; for the sex emotions are among the deepest, if not the deepest, of our nature, and colour every experience. From their proximate beginning in infancy—and Freud's theory here is of immense significance—to their multi-form derivatives in adult life, the sex emotions exercise an influence on every phase of development, and, in one form or another, are themselves a normal index of the stages of development. It is, therefore, reasonable to expect that they should play a great part in the formation of obsessions, of fixed ideas, of perversions, of repressed complexes. In every civilisation, as Freud indicates, the sex emotions are the most difficult to control, and have demanded the greatest amount of restraint." In view of these facts I think it can hardly be maintained that Freud's theory need be understood as implying any slur on the subconscious self.

The second point is the relation of Freud's theories to free will. It is quite true that Freud avows himself a psychological determinist of the most rigid nature. But I do not know that he anywhere says that "mechanism is all, and consciousness nothing." Indeed, his work, to me at least, seems to lead to the very opposite conclusion. A psychological determinist appears to be one who believes that no human action, however bizarre, is done without a motive. Impelled by this article of faith Freud and his school are introducing rationality and order into a region where rationality and order have long been believed to be non-existent. (See notably Jung's work on "Dementia Praecox.") The incomprehensible outburst, the incoherent ravings of the madman are shown to be motivated in much the same way as the activities of his saner brother. Freud finds reasons for these actions just as he finds reasons for our dreams and other curious habits; but he does not find mechanical causes. It is only custom that blinds us to the fact that mechanical causation is essentially unintelligible. The psychological causation which Freud endeavours to establish is essentially intelligible. We may talk of the psychic mechanism if we will, but it is a mechanism which every cure effected by Freud and his followers shows that we can learn to work. The "free will enthusiasts," we consider, have really no cause for quarrel with Professor Freud.—Yours, &c.,

THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE SPIRIT.

The Historic and the Inward Christ: a Study in Quaker Thought. The Swarthmore Lecture, 1914. By Edward Grubb, M.A. London: V. Headley Bros. 1s. net.

MR. EDWARD GRUBB'S Swarthmore Lecture furnishes an interesting and suggestive study of the Quaker doctrine of the person of Christ, represented in its various phases, after the first great impulse of George Fox's testimony to the reality of the inward light, by the teaching of such diverse men as Isaac Pennington, Elias Hicks, and J. J. Gurney. But there is more than history in the lecture. It makes a direct appeal to the religious experience of the present and especially to the younger members of the Society of Friends, that they should face the question: What actually is the Christ of inward experience? "How can the historic and the inward Christ be held as one; how can that one Life, lived so long ago, be also the inward Light in the souls of all men, how can it be the hope of the world to-day, the well-spring of love and joy and power for service in Christian hearts?"

Mr. Grubb attempts no final answer to this question, but he indicates the lines on which, in his view, an answer must be sought, and it is, broadly speaking, on the lines of the writer of the Fourth Gospel and his doctrine of the Logos. "Our faith as Christians and as Friends," he says at the conclusion of the lecture, "centres in a Person: a Person who has always been present in the souls of men, the revealer of God, though unrecognised or dimly apprehended; a Person who in the fulness of time took outward form" in the human life of Jesus, fulfilling his mission of salvation, and now "ever lives, not in some far-off heaven, but in our midst, evermore to be the inward source of light and love, of power and joy, to those who are united to Him by faith and obedience" (p. 83). And earlier in the lecture (p. 31) he has said that the centre of Christian faith, on its intellectual side, is that "the Word became flesh," that is to say, "that a Timeless and Omnipresent Spirit, in some sense one with God, took upon Him the limitations of time and space and finite humanity."

There is the point at which the crucial question arises: can that belief, on the intellectual side, really be the permanent centre of Christian faith? Are we obliged to recognise in the circle of Christian experience two "timeless and omnipresent" Spirits, of whom the second is only "in some sense one with God," and is it this second Spirit (Justin's "second God") who became incarnate in Jesus, who is now in our midst, as the inward source of light and love? We cannot think that the abiding fellowship of Jesus with his disciples, as the living Christ, is to be so interpreted.

It is true that in the earliest record we have of a disciple's inward experience, Paul does not seem always to distinguish clearly between the Spirit of God and of Christ, e.g., in Romans viii.: yet "heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ" gives us the right guidance; and again, that word to the Galatians, "When it was the good pleasure of God to reveal His Son in me." And when we come to the testimony of George Fox and his companions, the Inward Light is constantly identified with the Spirit of Jesus Christ, but also with the Spirit of God, or, in Nayler's phrase, "the Father of all our righteousness." But it is Fox himself who tells us how, when he turned in despair from all human teachers, he heard a Voice which said, "There is one, even Jesus Christ, that can speak to thy condition," and it came to him as a revelation, "as the Father of life drew me to his Son by his Spirit."

The permanent centre of Christian faith must surely be in God absolutely, in the one Eternal Spirit, ever-present, the Source of all light and life, because in Him, in surrender to our Father's will, must be the ultimate centre of all vital religious faith. And when we say that our surrender as Christians, and our fellowship in the hidden life of faith, must be in Christ's spirit, that is also perfectly true, because God has given to us this living fellowship with Jesus, the Christ, and the Inward Light, the Eternal Spirit of all truth, bears witness to him in the human heart, "his Spirit with our spirit."

"Christ," it should always be remembered, is "the Anointed One," consecrated of God, given to the world, as history has proved and experience constantly affirms, with the highest mission of human enlightenment, renewal, and uplifting. In him we recognise the ideal of a true manhood, the power of the spirit in a true man to overcome evil with good, the Friend, the Inspirer, the Leader of our race in the true life with God. And when we speak of "the spirit of life in Christ Jesus" it is not of the life or person of "another God" that we are thinking, but of the spiritual power of the human life, with all the grace and truth in it, which we recognise in Jesus, the human life enfolded in the Divine care, consecrated to his divine mission, quickened by the Eternal Spirit; and when we say "a human life," we mean the spiritual life of one who is a child of God, living the human life here on earth in the communion of the Spirit of God, and with a heavenly destiny.

This spirit of life was in Jesus during his earthly ministry and through the agony and triumph of the Cross. Out of the darkness of that conflict it was kindled anew in the disciples, and so Christianity was born. It lives again in every sincere disciple. It was so at the great awakening which came through George Fox and his companions, and it is so in many a humble heart to-day. God ministers to us of the things of Jesus Christ.

Thus "the Christ of inward experience" is one with the historic Christ in so far as Jesus remains a living friend to all who know and learn of him, still the Leader in the great fellowship of the children of God, manifest to us in the light of Divine Truth, inspirer of what is best in our manhood. He is the consecrated Channel of Divine Grace, but he is not the Source. And we must never forget that what makes Jesus "the Christ" now in our fellowship with him, and in our discipleship, as in the days of his earthly ministry and of the first testimony of the disciples to the risen Christ, is that other presence of the Holiest, the Eternal Spirit, Quickener, Enlightener, and Sustainer of all living souls. In God, and with God, surrendered with Jesus to our Father's will, we understand the truth and enter into life. In the light of that conviction all Christian doctrine must be tested and all Christian experience interpreted.

FIVE more volumes of the Home University Library will be published by Messrs. Williams & Norgate next Tuesday. The editors are to be congratulated upon the twelfth issue of this successful series, which brings the number of volumes up to ninety-five. The new set comprises "The Alps," by Mr. Arnold Lunn; "Elizabethan Literature," by Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P.; and "The Renaissance," by Miss Edith Sichel, Professor W. R. Shepherd gives a timely account of the twenty republics of "Central and South America," and Dr. R. H. Charles, Canon of Westminster, in a detailed examination of the apocryphal and pseudepigraphic writings, deals with the subject of "Religious Development between the Old and the New Testaments."

MESSRS. EDWARD ARNOLD will publish shortly a translation by Mr. W. B. Drummond, M.B., C.M., F.R.C.P., of "Mentally Defective Children," by Alfred Binet and Dr. Simon, with an appendix containing the Binet-Simon tests of intelligence by Miss Margaret Drummond, M.A., and an introduction by Professor A. Darroch. This book should be of practical value to students of psychology, to teachers and students training as teachers, and to all who are concerned in the working of the Mental Deficiency Act.

THE FAIRY WORKERS.

II.

As I said last week, Puck was quite troubled when he saw how sad Titania was about the beautiful valley which had been destroyed, so he flew to the snow fairies. They were quite willing to help, and down they danced all night, millions of them, and still others came all day. When the moon shone out Puck went to fetch Titania, and you cannot think how joyful she and all her people were as they saw the glistening white blanket covering all the dirt and rubbish. How they danced! When the moon went they danced under the starlight, till at day-break they went to hide. But when the sun came out he sent his beams to carry off the snow fairies, who were wanted to make some of those dear little white clouds we love to see, and so Over-the-wall was left all bare and ugly again, and Titania was so sad that even her wings became limp.

Now there was one tiny brown sprite, hardly larger than a pin's point, who longed to serve her Queen. "I will make the valley beautiful again," she said. She spoke so softly that only her sisters near her heard. And if the others had heard I fear they would have thought her too little and plain to be much good. The sisters whispered to their relations, and all promised to help. They were quite a long way from the ugly valley, but they managed to get a ride on a great wagon of hay. When it reached the new street they whispered to the wind, and he carried them to Over-the-wall with a puff. They were rather frightened when they saw the dusty, desolate place, but they bravely began to work at once. Each settled in a wee hole, and, putting her feet firmly into the soil, shot tiny green arms out of her brown coat. They drank the rain, and the sun cheered them with his warm, bright rays, and day by day their arms grew longer and greener. The birds told their friends who had stayed behind what they were trying to do, and hundreds of them came flying to Over-the-wall by the next breeze, and dropped down, and with their waving green arms helped to cover the bareness.

By and by Titania came that way again. She really did not mean to do so, but it was the shortest way to the Midsummer night hills, and she forgot about the ugliness till she saw the wooden wall.

"We will fly over it very quickly," she said. The moon was making it almost as bright as daylight, and lighted up the little fairies which now covered the rubbish heaps and broken bricks with their waving green arms. Titania opened her eyes with surprise at the change.

"Well done, my brave busy Grass fairies," she said, "you have done noble work. You have changed ugliness into beauty." And she commanded her messengers to call the rest to hold their midsummer-night revels there.

Later on Flower fairies joined the Grass fairies at their work, and people riding by on top of the omnibus saw Over-the-wall gay with golden coltsfoot and pink Willow herb and many other flowers, and wrote to the newspapers about it. One man heard the Grass singing its gentle little song, and this is what he thought it said:

Here I come creeping, creeping everywhere;

By the dusty road-side,
On the sunny hill-side,
Close by the noisy brook,
In every shady nook

I come creeping, creeping everywhere.

Here I come creeping, creeping everywhere;

You cannot see me coming,
Nor hear my low sweet humming;
For in the starry night,
And the glad morning light,

I come quietly creeping everywhere.

Another poet calls it by a beautiful name. He says "Grass is the handkerchief of the Lord." God uses it to cover over ugly places and make the world beautiful.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

ANNUAL MEETING IN MANCHESTER.

THE ministers, delegates, and other friends of the Provincial Assembly responded on Wednesday, June 24, in good numbers, to the invitation of the Cross-street Chapel congregation, who were seconded in their generous hospitality by a host of faithful helpers of the Lower Moseley-street Schools. The proceedings began with the service in Cross-street Chapel, when the devotions were conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall as supporter, and the Rev. G. A. Payne delivered an impressive appeal ("O come, let us worship and bow down") for the maintenance of earnest observance of fellowship in common prayer and praise, and especially for care to be given to the religious training of the young people.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After luncheon, the well-attended business meeting was held in the Memorial Hall. The absence of the President, the Rev. J. J. Wright, through sickness, was much deplored, and the chair was taken by Mr. J. Wigley, ex-president, who asked the meeting to express its deep sense of loss at the death of Mr. Charles Wright, the brother of the President. This was done by silent resolution, all standing. After the reading of the roll by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, an address was delivered by the Rev. J. E. Odgers, D.D., of Oxford.

In the course of this, Dr. Odgers reviewed the theological tendencies of the present time, and referred specially to the question of divinity degrees, the work and influence of Manchester College, the recent petition of the theological faculties of Oxford and Cambridge praying for the relief of candidates for Holy Orders from the necessity of declaring that they believed unfeignedly all the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, and the difficulty which still exists in regard to the revision of the Athanasian Creed. Going on to speak of the Kikuyu controversy, he said that never since 1841 has the Anglican Church been so definitely summoned to declare that it was not Protestant and could have no communion with Protestants. In that year, John Henry Newman protested that to admit maintainers of heresy to communion without formal renunciation of their errors went far towards a recognition of heresy, adding that Lutheranism and Calvinism were heresies repugnant to Scripture and anathematised by East as well as West. As a result of the action of the Bishop of Zanzibar, the question has arisen, Has the Church of England moved so far in anti-Reformation sympathies that every one of her clergy who ranks himself as a Protestant is to be edged out of her service? This is to reverse history. We know the part that the Reformers played, and how the Church of England was moved by the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and how the British Ambassador, when Protestant services were forbidden in Paris, used to go up the river to attend such services at Charenton, where they were permitted. The intervention of Bishop Gore has made the whole question a most critical one. He has declared that the episcopate is of the essence of the Church, holding the basis of Anglican fellowship to be literal belief in the language of the creeds. The denier "cannot legitimately, or with due regard to public sincerity, retain his position as an officer in a church which requires of its officers the constant recitation of the Creeds." This perpetually being judged by others as to what is conscientious and what is not made one thankful to be attached to a religious communion in which a man is not arraigned by superiors, or taunted by equals, as to the profession of individual faith. "I have a belief," said Dr. Odgers, "a hope long deferred, in the possibility of a comprehensive national Church, even as Martineau had, even as J. M. Thompson now has, but nothing makes for it unless it be the stand that is being taken by the most eminent theologians of the Universities against the narrow and sectarian desire of the majority of the English clergy to lead the nation back to mediæval observance and unquestioning subservience."

The subject of the historical Christ, which has received so much attention, was next dealt with, the two main theories of the group of writers who deny the personal existence of Jesus being summarised, and students were referred to Dr. Carpenter's "The Historical Jesus and the Theological Christ." Dr. Odgers concluded by drawing attention to the recent interesting investigations among the early Babylonian tablets disinterred at Nippur. A pre-Semitic account of the Deluge is described as "clearly the original of that preserved in the book of Genesis." The same tablet, the inscriptions on which are in Sumerian (a cuneiform alphabet of the pre-Semitic inhabitants of Babylonia) contains a reference to the Fall of Man. This is the first reference to the Fall that has been found in Babylonian literature. But it is Noah and not Adam who is tempted and falls, and the tree is the cassia, the most important of all the medicinal plants of antiquity and hence may have arisen the notion of the cassia as a tree giving eternal life.

At the close of his address Dr. Odgers warmly commended to the notice of the meeting what he called the truly apostolic letter to the churches to be found in the report, under the title "The Revival of Religion in our Churches," which was reprinted in THE INQUIRER on June 27.

The meeting was then invited to consider the reports of the Committee on missionary work and public questions, by the Rev. J. Morley Mills and Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson respectively.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson moved the following resolution on behalf of the Committee:—"That this Assembly views with alarm the inordinate growth of armaments, due to the rivalry in naval construction between England and Germany. That this Assembly, believing that the cause is found in the entrance of England into the arena of European politics, ranging herself in the Entente Cordiale with France and Russia against the Triple Alliance of Germany, Austria and Italy, calls upon His Majesty's Government to release the nation from such entanglements. That this Assembly finds new hope for the diminution of naval rivalry between England and Germany in the speech of Sir Edward Grey holding out promises of the abolition of the right of capture of private property at sea; that it finds the ultimate solution in the substitution of international arbitration for the arbitrament of war."

Mr. Dowson in support of this resolution gave a comprehensive sketch of European history as it had unfolded during his lifetime, and pointed to the emergence of new facts which now gave him great hopes. The resolution was seconded by Mr. P. M. Oliver, the prospective Liberal candidate for the Knutsford division. The Rev. C. J. Street objected to the implication that the Entente Cordiale was the cause of the present situation, and moved to replace the second clause by the words "That this Assembly calls upon His Majesty's Government to endeavour to bring about a good understanding with Germany, as it has done with France and Russia." Mr. G. G. Armstrong said he believed we had gone astray, not by having an Entente but by misusing it, and he asked Mr. Dowson to meet the point raised by using the words "one cause" instead of "the cause," and omitting the reference to the Entente Cordiale. Mr. Dowson agreed to this, and the motion was accepted, Mr. Street's amendment, which was voted upon, being lost.

The following resolution on the Principle of the Living Wage was moved by the Chairman, and seconded by the Rev. W. Whitaker, who pointed to the great change in public opinion on the question in recent years:—"That holding as Christians that the individual life of every person is sacred, and that it is therefore intolerable for any department of our industry to be carried on under conditions which involve the misery and want of the labourer, we believe it to be the fundamental Christian principle of wages that the first charge upon any industry should be the proper maintenance of the labourer; and we therefore declare our adhesion to the principle of the living wage, and pledge ourselves to co-operate in promoting its extended application in whatever way we can, both by our prayers and by our private and public action." This was carried unanimously.

The officers for the year were then elected, Mr. Albert Nicholson being elected President, and Mr. John Dendy again appointed Treasurer, and the Revs. H. E. Dowson and N. Anderton secretaries. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith was elected supporter for next year.

EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Mr. G. Rayner Wood in the chair. The Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, who responded to the vote of thanks for hospitality shown to the delegates and visitors, touched lightly upon the perturbation of many minds in Manchester owing to unfounded rumours about Cross-street Chapel. The Chairman, in his opening remarks, spoke of the revival of interest in the grand old edifice and of the success which had attended the efforts of Mr. Thomas in chapel and school, and expressed the hope that the Provincial Assembly would again, after a term of years, meet in Cross-street Chapel. He added that they happened to have met together on the 220th anniversary of the first service in the chapel.

The Rev. R. Travers Herford then delivered an address on "The Modern Peril to Religion," in the course of which he said that thirty years ago the danger to religion was agnosticism. Now the chief danger to religion is that no one cares to attack it. There is not the same sense, now, that religion matters. There is, for example, increasing difficulty in getting workers for the Sunday school. Great numbers of people do not care to know what the serious thought of the day is, or who are the chief leaders. To what is this due? (1) It is partly the backwash of agnosticism. Large numbers of people of the present generation have grown up without any definite impressions as to religion, because their parents were themselves uncertain about it, and not able to give any direction. (2) It is partly due to the increased strain of life and the increase of amusements which attempt to relieve it. We ought not to condemn this, but rather to counteract it by giving greater attention to the need of quiet thought, careful allotment of times for meditation and regular methods of earnest prayer. (3) There is the tendency to break away from authority in every department of life. This movement has its roots far back in the sixteenth century, and is in essence deeply religious. Its ultimate results, as distinct from its temporary disadvantages, will be good. (4) Social reform has become a competitor with religion. It is not religion, although it is associated with it, and although many earnest men practically make it into a religion. These two are really the two sides of one reality. Social reform is unconscious religion. If we are true to the best on both these lines, they will ultimately come to a deep and profoundly helpful agreement.

Dr. G. Jessel, M.A., M.B., of Atherton, spoke on "Religion and Social Progress." The awakening of a social consciousness is one of the great marks of our time, he said, but we must understand that the aim of this is not mere worldly prosperity. People often speak as if discontent were something new. It is perennial. It comes in waves or cycles, and the material objects it aims at are nearly always attained. Yet can we say that humanity is really better as a result? In making our estimates in reply to such questions we do not pay enough regard to the moral and spiritual side of our being. Neither riches nor poverty creates a monopoly of virtue or vice in any class. Legislation is potent and necessary, but if we are to make progress, more advantage must be taken of the good things already provided by legislation, such as the Housing Acts and the Food and Drugs Acts. After all, the best social work that is being done is of the type that we see in our Domestic Mission.

Principal S. H. Mellone was to have spoken on "What is Progress in Religion?" but was detained at Edinburgh and unable to be present. The Rev. H. E. Dowson stepped into the breach, and delighted the meeting with racy and moving reminiscences drawn from his long ministry.

GERMAN NOTES.

AN APPRECIATION OF WELLHAUSEN—
GERMAN ECCLESIASTICS AND CREMATION —UNION OF GERMAN ASSOCIATIONS OF YOUNG PEOPLE—A SUCCESSOR TO DR.
TRAUB.

JULIUS WELLHAUSEN celebrated his seventieth birthday on May 17, in the old and distinguished University town of Göttingen. The following is from an article by Eissfeld, which has appeared in the Protestantenblatt: "He is well known by theologians, and the friends of the Old Testament revere him. Yet his name is little known by the public. He would not have it otherwise; he ever kept himself separate from party strife, and from the clash of opinions in State and Church. Not that he is not fully abreast of the times—if you attend his lectures you are astonished by flashes of insight which throw a vivid light on the questions of the day. His lectures and his literary activity are sufficient for him. Nor has he ever written 'popular' books.

"Wellhausen is simple and homely; you would hardly take the tall, broad-shouldered man, as he passes you in the street, for a scholar of world-wide fame. If, however, you look closer at the powerful head and high forehead you wonder who this can be. His manner of lecturing is equally homely and simple. There is nothing attractive in the form of his addresses. Although he has notes on his desk he rarely uses them, and yet he speaks with head bent low just as if there were no audience present. He is so deaf that he cannot hear the bell which announces the end of the lecture, so he has asked the students to show their impatience if he goes on too long, and not infrequently one of them has to hold a watch under his very eyes. Then he gathers up his papers with a smile and departs. This lack of form probably explains the unpopularity of his lectures. One has to look beyond mere form, and be alert to catch the spirit of his addresses, and the ordinary student does not always rise to this.

"Nor had he ever much social intercourse with his students. Yet if one goes to him one finds a willing ear and ready response. One day a student, who had consulted him about some research work he was engaged in, was surprised to see Wellhausen at the door of his lodgings with a large parcel of books under his arm—books that had been taken from the Professor's own shelves.

"This quiet, modest man is one of the greatest, not only amongst theologians, but amongst men of science. One of his students who died recently, Rudolf Smend, said of him: 'He has the kind of mind which appears once in a century.' And Mommsen estimated his labours in the field of Israelitic history as the greatest deed of the 19th century. Another who learnt from Wellhausen, and is now one of the foremost of Old Testament scholars, compared him to a giant who, with mighty strokes, cleared a path through the primitive forest. The task of our time is to widen this path, and to clear away obstructions until there is a broad and even roadway."

It is difficult to understand the attitude of some of the ecclesiastical bodies in Germany towards cremation. The Brandenburg Consistory has issued the following note on the placing of urns in cemeteries: "The evangelical Oberkirchenrat has already, in 1903, declared that consistories, who are the authorities appointed to preserve Christian customs and regulations, should have the right to decide whether it is desirable to allow urns to be buried in the cemeteries—of course quickly and without any church service. It is well to hold fast to this decision, and, in addition, not to allow urns containing ashes to be exposed to view, even when a part of the cemetery has been set apart for this purpose, because of the religious sentiments of the majority who are opposed to cremation. An urn, therefore, must be buried in a grave, and may only be placed in a special building if it be deposited within a closed space. It is the duty of the Church to preserve the custom of earth-burial, which is sanctified by the Christian sentiment of the people. The erection of a building for the reception of urns cannot be sanctioned in a Christian burial-ground."

FROM May 24 to 27 a large gathering of members of the various associations connected with the Union of German Associations of Young People met within the hospitable walls of Cologne. The preparations for the meetings were in the hands of an executive committee composed of many distinguished persons, amongst whom were the Burgomaster and the Commandant of Cologne. Herr Dietz, the gifted organiser of the Youth of Cologne, was foremost in arranging a programme which ensured the success of the meetings, and which was drawn up with special consideration for the young people who were coming in large numbers to the famous town on the Rhine. The proceedings opened with Olympic games in the arena of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition. The excellent display, and the numbers that took part in it, showed that the Union realises that a sound mind requires a sound body. Pfarrer Spechmann preached the festival sermon in the hall of the Exhibition. A reception concluded the first day's proceedings, the young people themselves being responsible for an excellent programme. During the next two days the older members met for serious work, while the others spent their time mostly in sight-seeing. Pastor Dehn, of Berlin, speaking from personal experience, referred in moving words to the moral, spiritual, and physical misery resulting from the want of light, air, and space. The working people of his district, Moabit, live a cramped existence in two or three-roomed tenements. Exaggerated class-feeling, and the absence of a real home sentiment, produce an utterly anti-social spirit, which is without reverence for any of the deeper meanings of life. The young cannot be helped by merely providing clubs for amusement; they want the help of educated men and women who are ready to give of their best, men and women who are filled with a truly religious spirit. Professor Pöhlman, of Nürnberg, spoke of the work amongst the young people of the middle classes, and emphasised the need of harmony between the work of the schools and outside agencies. Another speaker, Walter Classen, had some sensible things to say about sport, and pleaded that, although games may easily become tainted with the vice of gambling, they, together with gymnastics, not only strengthen the muscles but are the means of fostering and furthering the power of reasoning, the feeling of comradeship, and the sense of social duty. The young girls had an evening to themselves, for which they made excellent arrangements. Pfarrer Zurbeller (Frankfurt), in a bright and warm-hearted address, spoke of the great change which had taken place in the position of girls and women, many of whom are engaged in the economic struggle. To the old saying "Honour the women" we must, he said, add "Give them their due as workers and wage-earners." The meetings closed with an excursion to the Seven Mountains.

ANOTHER election has taken place at Dortmund. Pastor Kappus, of Wiener-Neustadt, has been chosen to succeed Dr. Traub. Will the choice be approved by the Consistory?

PRESENTATION TO THE REV.

F. H. JONES.

AT the usual quarterly business meeting of Dr. Williams' trustees on June 25, a letter, signed by the 23 trustees, expressing warm appreciation of the Rev. F. H. Jones' services, now brought to a close through his retirement, as Librarian and Secretary, was presented to him. At the dinner after the meeting the chairman also presented Mr. Jones with a purse containing 100 guineas, and a copy of the Dictionary of National Biography subscribed for by 638 readers and other friends connected with Dr. Williams' Library. The letter was as follows:—

Dr. Williams' Library,

June 25, 1914.

To the Rev. Francis Henry Jones, Librarian and Secretary to the Trustees of the late Rev. Dr. Daniel Williams.

DEAR MR. JONES,—As the moment of our farewell to you as our Secretary and Librarian approaches and we look back on your long connection with the Trust, we feel that our relations have been so easy and informal that a set address seems out of keeping. And yet we cannot let you slip away from us without some words of appreciation and recognition.

Only three of us have accompanied you through the whole of your course, but all of us have received the same general impression of the characteristics of your work, and what the Trustees of long standing know the others understand and feel.

To escape the dead hand of the Founder and yet to be loyal to his living spirit, to be faithful to the purpose of a trust while making its methods plastic, to secure businesslike precision and effectiveness in the detail of administration and yet to retain the human and personal touch should be the ideal of every body of Trustees. You have not only helped us to realise this ideal, you have constantly inspired us to attain it.

When you became our Librarian we did not foresee the wonderful expansion which your enterprise would give to the Library, or the valued place it would take amongst the resources of theological students and of all classes of serious readers. How many students have been indebted to your varied knowledge of books and to your unfailing courtesy and desire to help, you yourself can hardly know. But the acknowledgments received again and again show how sincere and widespread is the appreciation of the service you have rendered.

We have all been impressed by your knowledge of affairs, your insight into business principles, and your command of detail, and few of us could have suspected, had we not known, that your previous training had been entirely that of a student of philosophy and letters and "a preacher of the word," and that you had never gone through any business drill or sat at an office table until you entered our service.

It is this remarkable combination of qualifications, not often united, making you equally at home when discussing the place of a book in the literature of its subject or the details of an agricultural holding in Wales, when advising upon the prospects of a city property or upon the best way to make our Scholarships bear upon the programmes of the theological colleges, when dealing with the mechanism of the library itself or the needs and deserts of the widows and struggling preachers whose personal history you followed so kindly and so closely, or the applications for a grant of "good books" for any of a hundred different purposes—it is this versatility, combined with conscientious thoroughness, that has been the cause of the gradual concentration of offices in your hands resulting in a unity of administration of the highest value to the Trust.

But we must not leave unsaid what we most want to say. As a body of Trustees, though no doubt a compact company with common principles and common traditions, we still have individuality of mind and purpose and on occasions divergence of views strongly held and expressed. Your wide knowledge and large sympathy have been most helpful in holding us together and giving coherence to our work. You have brought all our talents, such as they are, into play, and, though you have never been afraid of intervening with potent word and influence when necessary, you have always unreservedly accepted the decisions of the common voice and followed cheerfully and loyally where you could not lead; so that in the end we may even on occasions have found ourselves, because you always knew the way, just where you were guiding us.

Your memory will be green so long as any of us remain on the Trust, and the traditions of your stewardship will, we hope, survive to the end of that "two thousand years" beyond which eschatology itself has not leave to speculate.

And now that we take our leave of you in your official capacity we are glad to think of you as one who will be no longer "ministering to tables" and to whom we may turn for help when needed, and we hope that you may yet enjoy many years of quiet happiness in which the experience gained in the service of the Trust may fructify for a still wider circle of beneficiaries.

We are, dear Mr. Jones, your affectionate friends and fellow workers,

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

THE prizes were distributed at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, on Wednesday, June 24. Dr. Dawes Hicks presided, and was supported by his colleagues of the Presbyterian Board, Dr. Tudor Jones, and the Rev. Bertram Lister, and by the secretary, Mr. G. H. Clennell. There were also present Dr. Talfourd Ely (examiner in classics), and the Rev. Park Davies (examiner in Biblical studies). Among the visitors connected with Unitarian churches were the Revs. John Davies, Allt-y-placa; Lewis Williams, Rhydygwin; T. Arthur Thomas, Llandyssul; David Evans, Cribin; Simon Jones, Swansea; W. J. Phillips, Newton-Nottage; and Mr. and Mrs. Gwion Jones. Two of the examiners, Mr. Harold Bailly, of Brigg, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, were unfortunately unable to be present.

The students of the College number 31, four of whom were reported to be sitting for the B.D. degree of the University of Wales at various stages. In the course of his address, the greater part of which dealt with the relation between democracy and religion, and will be found in another part of the paper, the Chairman referred to the great loss the College had sustained by the death of Professor Jones, who had served the College with singular fidelity and devotion for nearly forty years, and Dr. Price, their medical officer for nearly eighteen years, who had always seemed to him a typical example of the best traditions of his profession. The work of the session was briefly reviewed, and gratitude expressed for the generous contribution towards the funds of the College made by the Hibbert Trustees, which has been such a splendid help.

Speeches were subsequently made by Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. Clennell, Dr. Talfourd Ely, and others, and the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Evans, wife of the Principal.

A CONFERENCE ON PORTUGUESE SLAVERY.

IN view of the fact that recent inquiry by British Consuls confirms the allegations of slave-trading and slave-owning by the Portuguese planters of West Africa, the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society is organising a conference to consider the situation, and especially the following points:—(1) What steps can be taken to secure a more rapid emancipation of the 30,000 slaves on the cocoa islands; (2) The means now employed by the Portuguese Administration to secure labourers for the planters; (3) What further action is necessary to bring home to the British public the responsibility imposed upon Great Britain by the Anglo-Portuguese Alliance. The Archbishop of Canterbury will preside, and will be supported by the Bishop of London and members of the Free Church Council. Amongst those who have promised to be present are Lord Selborne, Lord Mayo, Lord Channing, Lord Lamington, Sir Harry Johnston, and a number of members of Parliament, including Lord Henry Bentinck, Lord Alexander Thynne, the Rt. Hon. W. H. Dickinson, Sir Stephen Collins, Sir J. Compton Rickett, Sir J. Jardine, Sir Gilbert Parker, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, Mr. T. E. Harvey, Mr. Douglas Hall and Mr. J. R. MacDonald. The Conference will be held at the Whitehall Rooms, on July 16, at 2.30 p.m.; admission will be by ticket, which may be obtained from the offices of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge-road, S.W.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Belfast.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held in All Souls' Church on Sunday, June 21. The minister, the Rev. E. H. Pickering, preached morning and evening, and a floral service was held in the afternoon.

Birmingham.—A meeting of teachers connected with the Midland Sunday School Association was held at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on June 22. The Rev. J. Graham read a paper on "The Graded School," dealing with the methods of the various departments, and giving some very strong reasons why Unitarian schools would be well advised to adopt these ideas, or some of them. Delegates to district meetings and to the Whit Tuesday meeting in London subsequently gave accounts of their visits. The annual united service was held on Sunday afternoon, June 28, in the Town Hall. The service was conducted by the Rev. H. C. Hawkins (Oldbury), the Rev. C. Thrift (Birmingham) giving the address. The hall was well filled, all the Birmingham schools joining in worship. Before the service Mr. C. W. Perkins, city organist, gave a short recital, and at the end played the "Hallelujah Chorus."

Horsham.—Referring to her letter of last week on Mark Rutherford's connection with Ditchling, Miss Kensett writes:—"I am sorry to trouble you again, but I am informed on the best authority that Mr. Hale White did marry the Rev. A. Macdougall, his predecessor, not successor, at Ditchling, in June, 1860, coming down from London to do so. His official connection with the church lasted a little over a year, 1855-6. May I inform your readers that the anniversary services at Ditchling take place on Sunday, when the services will be conducted by the Rev. H. Gow? Arrangements are made for the provision of lunch and tea, and it is a good time to visit this interesting Sussex meeting-house."

Ipswich: Eastern Union.—The annual assembly of the Eastern Union was held at Ipswich, on Thursday, June 18. A public meeting was held in the Friars-street Church at noon, Mr. C. J. Notcutt presiding. The secretary and treasurer read the committee's report and balance-sheet, and, owing to the absence of Miss S. S. Dowson, the Postal Mission report. A report from the Sunday School Association was read by Mr. G. Ward. The treasurer stated that the balance in hand of £30 was due to the principal churches in the Union being without ministers, so that grants for special services have had to be withheld, as no arrangements for holding them could be made under existing circumstances. On the motion of Mr. G. T. Moss, seconded by Mr. R. J. Collett, all the reports were adopted. The usual votes of thanks having been passed to the retiring officers and committee, consisting of Mrs. Mottram (Norwich), the Rev. W. Birks (Diss), Mr. F. Perry (Norwich), the Rev. A. E. Rump (Hapton), Mr. W. J. Scoopes (Ipswich), and Mr. A. M. Stevens (Norwich), these, together with the auditor, Mr. R. H. Mottram, and the secretary of the Postal Mission, Miss S. S. Dowson, and the secretary pro tem. and treasurer, Mr. R. Hamblin, were all re-elected. Addresses were given by Dr. J. H. Crooker, the Rev. J. Harwood, and the Rev. A. Copeland Bowie, and after lunch members and friends were conducted by Mr. F. Woolnough to various places of interest in the town. After tea a service was held in the church, the preacher being the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth.

London, Dingley-place Domestic Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes appealing for assistance in order that the numerous Sunday scholars of the Mission may have a day in the country as usual. All contributions will be gratefully received by him at 4, Durley-road, Stamford Hill, N. A course of health lectures is being given for women and girls at the Mission, and the Debating Society is having some good discussions. The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 28, when an address was delivered in the afternoon by the Rev. A. H. Biggs. On Tuesday the Boys' Own Brigade gave a display, and the prizes were distributed by Mr. R. P. Jones. Advantage was taken of the occasion by the boys to make a presentation to Mrs. Summers.

London, Finchley.—In connection with the Finchley Unitarian Church an adult school has been started (open to all over the age of 16). Meetings are held in the small hall every Sunday morning from 9 o'clock to 10.30. The first wedding at Granville Hall took place on Thursday, June 25, 1914, when Miss M. Storey was married to Mr. S. Ford Smith, of Manchester, and in accordance with ancient custom the occasion was marked by the presentation of a Bible to the bride from the Church.

London: Walthamstow.—In connection with the work of the Pioneer Sisters, a woman's conference was held at the Unitarian Church, Walthamstow, on June 24, when a very helpful address was given by Mrs. Blake Odgers. Mrs. Morgan, who paid a warm tribute to the work of the Sisters, conveyed the greeting of the Women's Conference at Forest Gate, and Mrs. Rayment spoke on behalf of the Sisterhood at Stratford. Mr. Sorensen, as minister of the church, also spoke. Mrs. White proposed a vote of thanks to Mrs. Blake Odgers, which was seconded by Mrs. R. Maguire.

Swansea: The late Mr. Morgan B. Williams.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. Morgan Bransby Williams, of Swansea, which occurred on June 21, in his 90th year. Mr. Williams, who was descended from the Cadogan family who once reigned over the whole of the Rhondda Valley, and was the son of Dr. John Morgan Williams, of Bridgend, was trained as a civil engineer, and was at the time of his death the oldest Welsh member of the Institute of Civil Engineers. In the course of a long and extensive experience he had played an important part in the laying down of some of the first railways not only in this country but on the Continent of Europe. In Italy he was engaged in building the Genoa and Voltri, the Piacenza, the Bologna and other railways; whilst from 1858 to 1868 he was associated with the late Sir John Hawkshaw, the eminent engineer, in the prospecting, constructing, and management of altogether upwards of 800 miles of railways in Russia. In 1870 Mr. Williams retired and settled at Killay House, a lovely retreat in the Clyne Valley overlooking Swansea Bay, and devoted himself actively to the administrative affairs of his native county. He was a Justice of the Peace, and in 1894-5 filled the important office of High Sheriff with conspicuous zeal and ability. An ardent Liberal and Welsh Nationalist, he took an active interest in politics, though he twice refused to stand for Parliament and follow the example of his brother, Mr. Arthur J. Williams, for many years M.P. for South Glamorgan. He was a staunch Unitarian, and an ardent fighter in the cause of civil and religious liberty.

Wakefield.—The Rev. J. Mason Bass, M.A., began his ministry at the Westgate Chapel, Wakefield, on Sunday, June 21, preaching in the morning on "The Church and the Ministry," and in the evening on "Truth, Liberty and Religion." On the following Wednesday a welcome meeting was held in the schools, Mr. W. H. Marriott, chairman of the trustees, presiding over a large gathering. Mr. A. H. Webster gave a hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Bass on behalf of the congregation, and the Rev. R. Nicol Cross (Mill Hill) welcomed Mr. Bass into the Yorkshire Union. The Rev. Dr. Thackray (Huddersfield) also spoke, and the Rev. J. E. Langley (United Methodist Free Church) welcomed Mr. Bass on behalf of the other Nonconformist bodies in Wakefield. Mr. Tho's. Rigby, of Chesham, and the Rev. T. B. Evans, of Heywood, spoke of his excellent work in Lancashire and Mr. Bass replied in suitable terms.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

ANIMAL SUNDAY.

The Animals' Guardian points out that Sunday, July 5, will be kept as Animal Sunday, and we cordially hope a large number of ministers, Sunday school teachers and parents will take this opportunity of helping to form a more enlightened public opinion on the subject of man's duty to all dumb creatures. The defeat of Sir Frederick Banbury's Dog Bill, which every animal lover will regret, and the ceaseless opposition to the Plumage Bill which is still hampering the efforts of its supporters, show that a great deal of work remains to be done before the nation, as a whole, is made to realise the moral degradation involved in our present attitude towards the lower creation, and the "slaughter of the innocents" at which too many of us connive.

A GREAT INDIAN MUSICIAN.

The death is announced of Raja Sir Sourendro Mohun Tagore, Kt., C.I.E., the head of the distinguished Bengali family to which Mr. Rabindranath Tagore belongs. He was regarded as the first classical musician in India, and founded the Bengal Music School in 1871, and ten years later the Bengal Academy of Music, maintaining both at his own expense. Earlier in his life he had devoted himself to the drama and translations from the Sanskrit, but it fell to his elder brother, the late Maharaja Jotindra Mohun Tagore, to play a more conspicuous part in modernising and popularising the Bengali drama. By means of his Academy of Music, and the composition, publication, and free distribution of many musical works, he succeeded in reducing Hindu melody to an intelligible system, and in reviving its cultivation, after centuries of neglect, among the well-to-do classes of his countrymen. His notation system came to be widely adopted, and he trained the musicians, often inventing or making the instruments, by whom this music could be played. At the request of a London committee he set the words of the English National Anthem to 12 varieties of Indian melody, and also made a Bengali translation of the Anthem, which was widely distributed at his expense. He was the first Indian to receive the degree of Doctor of Music, conferred by Oxford in absentia in 1896.

MAETERLINCK AND THE SUBCONSCIOUS INTELLIGENCE OF ANIMALS.

Maeterlinck has been describing a recent visit to the "thinking horse" of Elberfeld, of which we have heard so much lately, and the animal's intelligence has stimulated afresh the sense of wonder which his patient and loving study of flowers and bees first awakened. As usual, he expresses himself in beautiful and suggestive language, and is evidently fascinated with the idea that horses, and all other living things, may possess "a sense analogous to that which lies buried under the veil of our reason." "We might almost believe," he says, "that a shudder of awakening, never before experienced, is spreading itself over every living thing, that a new force and impatience is vivifying the spiritual atmosphere and is making itself felt in the animal world as well. A new word goes from mouth to mouth, and the same manifestations come from all corners of the world to force themselves upon our attention. It is as if the dumb and stubborn spirit of the universe, which has hidden itself in busy silence, from the silence of the stones, flowers, and insects to the silence of the stars—as if this spirit is at last to betray some secret, through which we shall learn to know it better, or through which it will learn to know itself."

THE SPELLING OF THE BIBLE.

Professor W. E. Barnes recently wrote to the Times advocating a revision of our spelling based on the early versions of the Bible, which would mean a great return towards phonetic spelling. It is true, he said, that the Authorised Version shows great inconsistencies in its spelling, but on the other hand it has the merit of preserving many valuable phonetic forms of words which are now conventionally mis-spelt. Thus the A.V. retained the "anker" of Middle English at least as late as 1648. After more than 300 years of use why was it ever given up? It still represents the modern pronunciation of the word, and it corresponds letter for letter with its German equivalent. What, on the other hand, is to be said for "anchor"? The Latin is "ancora" without the h, and the Anglo-

Saxon similarly is "ancor." Again, four useful suggestions can be taken from Psalm lxxviii. alone as printed from the edition of 1611 in Aldis Wright's Hexaplar Psalter. "Beleeved" avoids the silly confusion between "ei" and "ie" which at present we thrust upon children, and "yeeres" avoids the additional folly of making "ea" a third equivalent for "ee." "Jelousie" would save us from the absurdity of writing a diphthong to represent a short vowel. The foolish double l in "marvellous" was still single in 1611. Strange was the fate of "receipt" (Matt. ix. 9). The Apostle sat at the "reelit" of custom at least up to 1648, and the connection of the word with its French parent "recette" was not obscured. Some time later a pedantic person inserted a p to suggest that "recette" in its turn came from "receptio." But are our English words, being intended for use, to bear two loads of etymology?

BRITISH WIVES AND WIDOWS OF ALIENS.

The following resolution was passed by the Women's Local Government Society on June 18:—"The Women's Local Government Society deeply regret that in Clauses 10 and 11 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Bill it should be proposed to re-enact the disabilities imposed in 1870 on married women and widows in regard to their nationality. They beg leave respectfully to urge upon His Majesty's Ministers that such provisions must constitute a disqualification for the British-born wives and widows of aliens, both for being parochial electors and for election to local bodies, and even for continuing to serve if already elected as Councillor or Guardian. They deplore that at a time when the Government has introduced a Bill to render further available the services of married women in local government the proposed legislation would have the opposite effect."

THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE.

The Open-Air "Campaign" which the United Kingdom Alliance is conducting from May to September inclusive is now in full swing. The June list of meetings showed a remarkable series of nearly 150 meetings which had been arranged to be held in different parts of London during that month. Last year 821 meetings were held in the open air, with an attendance of nearly 400,000 people, and this year an endeavour is being made to hold 1,000. This educational work is of the highest importance inasmuch as the Alliance is thus reaching "the man in the street," and teaching the principle of total abstinence and the truths of Temperance reform to many thousands of people who are not reached at all by the ordinary methods of propaganda.

THE chess players who have taken such an interest in Mr. Williams' column may be glad to have a little holiday during the height of summer. It has been decided, therefore, to discontinue it for the present, but it will be resumed in the autumn.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE death of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain brings a great and notable career to a quiet end. In one sense the end came nearly eight years ago, when he was stricken on the field and condemned for the rest of his days to a retirement which he bore with courage and patience. For more than forty years he filled a conspicuous place in public life, and by his marvellous gifts of speech and organisation wielded a power in the community second to none of the men of his time. It is well to remember that he began his training for public affairs as a teacher and superintendent in the Church of the Messiah Sunday schools, Birmingham, followed by years of splendid service in the conduct of municipal business. Birmingham, to its credit, has never forgotten the days when Chamberlain, George Dixon, George Dawson, and Drs. Dale and Crosskey laboured together and resolved to make a clean sweep of old and corrupt tradition, and to fashion the city after a lofty ideal of civic government. Chamberlain was the moving spirit, and it is not too much to say that, with the aid of the friends and fellow-workers he gathered about him, he rebuilt Birmingham, and made of it a place of which its citizens are justly proud. Not the least of his services was his success in appealing to the educated and wealthy classes to come forward and take their share in the work, not to say the drudgery, of town affairs. To the end he preached the duty of public service in this smaller sphere as the best preparation for service in the larger sphere of the State. Schools, art galleries, free libraries, public parks sprang into existence under his influence, and life for thousands took on a brighter hue.

It is not in these columns that Mr. Chamberlain's career as a political leader can be discussed. Enough to say that by his incisive gift of speech, by his indefatigable labours, by his vigour of mind, and, lastly, by his magnificent courage, he speedily took his place in the front rank, to be reckoned with by every party. He was a formidable debater and an effective parliamentarian, as much dreaded by opponents as admired by friends. The younger generation can hardly realise that he was once as much the object of furious abuse by all the newspapers representing the privileged classes as any politician of to-day. Mud-throwing is no modern accomplishment, and Mr. Chamberlain had a full share of that unsavoury treatment.

* * *

COMING of a Unitarian stock, Mr. Chamberlain remained faithful to his family traditions unto the end. He was a generous supporter of the Church of the Messiah and of its flourishing domestic mission. In private life he was abundantly loyal to his friends, and never failed to respond to the appeals that were made to him for counsel and help. In later years he rendered a great service to his adopted city by the zeal, almost amounting to a moral passion, with which he devoted himself to the founding of the Birmingham University. It had long been talked about, and little came of the talk but shaking of heads at the difficulties in the way. In a happy day Chamberlain took up the idea, and, as if by magic, it was transformed from a dream to a reality. Giving freely of his own time and money, he laid all his friends under contribution, and lived to see a great seat of learning, which will ever be associated with his name, firmly established in the capital of the Midlands.

* * *

THE meetings in London of the First International New Thought Convention just concluded mark a considerable advance in the movement which claims Emerson for godfather and Mrs. Eddy for god-mother. A more astonishing juxtaposition of names could scarcely be imagined. Of the movement as a whole it may be said that the only original thing about it to-day is its doctrine of Deep Breathing, which is to change ugliness into beauty, keep the aged young, and develop mental sanity. As for the rest of its principles and doctrines they are very much the same familiar to Christendom for nigh two thousand years. Here is the official statement of the principles of the Convention:—

The Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

Indwelling Presence as a source of supply, health, and inspiration.

Principles of Christ as every-day rules of life.

Physical, moral, and spiritual integrity.

Peace, prosperity, and liberty for all within the law.

Just where the New Thought comes in we cannot say. As these principles express the common stock of all Christian Churches we wish their new adherents all joy and success in their enterprise. But why start a new denomination?

* * *

THE new Hibbert Journal is a most excellent, not to say brilliant, number. With such contributors as the Dean of St. Paul's, the Rev. J. M. Thomson, Bertrand Russell, Canon Adderly, Drs.

Farnell and Agar Beet, the reader knows that he is in for a good time. The Dean's article on "Institutionalism and Mysticism" cuts clean across Professor Royce's doctrine of salvation by loyalty to the Beloved Community, and is a plea for the religion of the spirit rather than the religion of the Institution. The articles by A. D. McLaren and Archibald Weir, the one dealing with Liberalism in the Lutheran Church and the other with Liberalism in the Anglican Church, make a strenuous demand for clerical veracity. While the writers' sympathies are with men like Dr. Sanday, Mr. Thomson, and Pastors Jatho and Traub, they do not approve of their remaining in creedal churches and giving a symbolical interpretation of creeds which to the plain man is a kind of juggling with words. The weakness of the Broad Church party has always been the attempt to make words bear a meaning not in their plain grammatical sense but in some esoteric sense understood only by the initiated. There has been too often a large measure of justice in the charge that the priest and preacher was using words in one sense which the congregation understood in quite another.

* * *

MR. WEIR comes forward with a proposal for the relief of men in the Church who have outgrown the faith with which they started their career, but who for various reasons cannot face the logical issue. He proposes that a society should be formed to assist these unfortunate clergy who have learned too late that their reason cannot acquiesce in doctrines to which they pledged themselves in their undeveloped youth. Such assistance may take the form of inquiry, counsel, or money. The money and administration now devoted to the orthodox clergy, Mr. Weir thinks, could be put to better use if it obviated the presence of clergy who cannot minister to their flocks in the sense which the flocks consider honest and veracious. Certainly it would seem that if a fund could be raised for the temporary relief of men who for truth and conscience sake must resign their livings, it might do much to raise the standard of clerical veracity. But we doubt if the response likely to be made to an appeal for a fund with this object would be at all adequate. And, after all, it may be questioned whether the effort to make veracity easy would really be helpful to Liberal Religion. Truth is forwarded by those who are willing to suffer for it.

HYMNS and hymn writers are pleasant topics for essay writers, and it is a sign of the day that so many of our newspapers found time and space for eulogis-ing the hymns of Faber, the centenary of whose birth occurred on Sunday, June 28. It is not easy to place Faber as a hymn writer. Some of his work is quite beautiful—"Souls of men why will ye scatter," "I worship Thee, Sweet Will of God," "Oh, it is hard to work for God." On the other hand, several of his efforts are almost repulsive in their sickly sentiment and their use of fondling epithets when speaking of sacred things. The friend of Newman, with whom he seceded to Rome, he stands for a school of thought very difficult for Liberals in religion justly to appreciate. It was largely a backward movement he and Newman championed, creeping from the full light of day into every ruined archway and darkened crypt of the ecclesiastical mind. Nevertheless, Liberals can sing many of Faber's hymns with as much fervour as the highest of High Churchmen, since in his best moods he deals with the hopes and affections and aspirations that are common to the devout of every age and church. It is instructive to note that Faber's hymns were first introduced to the Nonconformist Churches of England by Martineau. Until his "Hymns of Praise and Prayer" appeared, Faber rarely found a place in denominational hymn books.

* * *

WHAT is it constitutes a good hymn? Alas! it must be admitted that many popular favourites are not "good" in any sense of the term. The really good hymns are not numerous. Yet we were delighted when not long ago, putting the question to a dozen different people, different in age and culture and sex, "What in your judgment is the best hymn in the English language?" nine out of the twelve replied: "O God, our help in ages past." For dignity, repose, truth, feeling, truth of imagery and simplicity, combined with a noble expression of faith, Watts' hymn must ever take a high place.

THE complaint is made that some of the hymns that have come from America and which have been made popular by professional revivalists are at once cheap and vulgar, full of mawkish sentiment and doggerel expression. But perhaps no hymnal ever contained so much doggerel as the first edition of "Hymns, Ancient and Modern." The great success of that book was entirely owing to its music, the authorities having the wisdom to enlist the services of the best church musicians of the time. But too many of the hymns were fiercely theological, written by men without any poetical skill or lyrical imagination, who were content to give the worshippers bald statements of dogma cut into appropriate lengths with more or less adequate rhymes at the end of the lines. Hymns of this sort can be made by the mile. A good hymn must be a genuine lyric, and genuine lyrics are far beyond the gifts and powers of most of our rhyming bards. The want of literary taste on the part of congregations is appalling. It would seem that congregations often sing hymns without giving a thought to the words they are using. Ministers, indeed, are often to blame. They find that most congregations join more heartily in some jingling composition, especially if it has a jingling tune, than in the finest work of Cowper, Addison, Wesley, or the stately hymn of Germany, so ably translated by Miss Winkworth. When the Sunday-school or other anniversary comes round the jingling rubbish carries the day, and the minister, who ought to know better, feels that doggerel is justified of her children!

IN an article on "Hotel Hospitality" which appeared in the Times of last Saturday dealing with the craze for colossal and expensive entertainments, the writer suggests, with a touch of cynicism, the need of founding a society for the propagation of home. He speaks of the "sad saturnalia" of extravagant dinners, dances, and suppers associated with the Ritz, the Savoy, and other fashionable hotels in London, and of the enormous dullness and monotony of the whole vulgar business. Not many of our readers, we take it, figure either as hosts or guests at these gigantic exhibitions of decadence and boredom, yet the disease they so offensively display runs through many sections of life, namely, the dislike of simple pleasures and the horror of an evening spent quietly at home with books and the family. Every day must have its excitement, every evening its change from the insipidities of the family circle. Home appears to so many rather a stupid place. There are young people who think themselves distinctly wronged unless each day brings its outing and each night some fresh distraction. For books, for the garden, for the message of the stars, for the beauty of a field of buttercups dancing in the breeze, for the peace of home—for all this they are out of tune. It is the disease Wordsworth noted: "The world is too much with us"—"We must run glittering like a brook in the open sunshine, or we are unblest." But the disease is more virulent now than in the poet's time. We need a return to simplicity and sanity. Entertainment has become so costly that the home flavour and the personal touch are lost. We do not see our real friends as often as we might, simply because we cannot or dare not invite them to our house for just a homely meal. Home is sacrificed to show, and "we have given our hearts away, a sordid boon."

JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN.

BY THE REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

THE churches of Birmingham meet this day deeply subdued by the knowledge that our greatest citizen has passed away from the number of the living. He had for years been in the anteroom of death, but that seems now to darken rather than lighten the tragedy of his end.

I am of all men among the least qualified to speak of him. I never saw or heard him. I never came personally under the direct and immediate spell of his magnetic influence. But he was a towering figure in contemporary politics, which none could escape, a man who completely won the heart of Birmingham, and never afterwards, through any change or crisis, lost its love or loyalty. To him, far more than to any single man, we trace the source of that spirit of civic pride and public service which characterises our city. On the roll of great English statesmen his name will stand among the foremost. The history of our Empire can never again be rendered intelligible without placing him among the few powerful personalities that have shaped its destiny.

There are in this congregation many who knew him as a relative or friend, and whose grief is a personal and intimate one. But they will try to forget private sorrow in a common public loss. In some respects all we in this congregation feel this to be a domestic loss, in this sense, that he was a member of our sister Church of the Messiah and of our household of faith. He never disguised his religious attachment. He was proud of his descent from the stock of one of the ejected ministers of 1662. He boasted, in his own words, of "a descent of which I am as proud as any baron may be of the title which he owes to the smile of a king, for I can claim descent from one of the 2,000 ejected ministers who, in the time of the Stuarts, left home and work and profit, rather than accept the State-made creed which it sought to force on them." His loss comes thus peculiarly near to our own members. Yet to-day we forget this more intimate grief and mingle ourselves with the great multitude of British citizens, and think of him in his public character.

His career, though outwardly a series of surprising reversals and changes, had its own inner consistency. Seen in its long dramatic development, we can detect the movement of an inflexible and almost Napoleonic will, drawn onward to the one end of Empire where at last it found its goal. His masterful mind was first exercised in the business enterprises into which he poured the amazing energy of his youth. Then it passed in ever-widening circles into the field of citizenship, then into the social politics of the nation, and finally into the world-arena of Imperial affairs. Everywhere he ruled with indomitable force. He was fearless, adventurous, brilliant, resourceful. Those who knew him found him in private life amiable and fascinating, having, as Lord Morley said, "a genius for friendship." Yet he was unsparing and merciless toward whatever obstacles stood in his way, and he cut his path to the goal with an inexorable directness. Once having steadily gazed on his vision, he sacrificed others for it with the same resoluteness that he sacrificed himself. In that sense the writer of the Memoir in the Birmingham Daily Post was correct when he wrote that "Mr. Chamberlain has never been a party man in the narrower sense of the word. The party he always regarded as a means to an end, a piece of mechanism. . . . From the beginning his attitude on this matter anticipated, if he did not actually foresee, the break up of parties which even in our own time has probably not reached its fullest development." That seem to me a just and luminous remark. If we can accept it in its full bearing we shall value as not the least of the high services of this statesman that he shattered one party after another in obedience to the ideal that claimed him beyond all shibboleths and systems—even beyond those to which he had once and again seemed irrevocably committed. One thing his life seems to cry out with a clear voice to our modern social reformers and politicians: Do not be tyrannised over by catch-words; do not hug too closely the pride of being consistent; be not afraid of changing your minds, or leaving your parties. See clearly what it is you mean, then give yourself to it with the ruthless abandonment and devotion that can shatter alliances, break associations, repudiate traditions, alienate friends, invent new programmes, and construct new loyalties.

Such a man must necessarily become in some measure an enigma. He will become hated by those whom he has left, suspected by those he has joined, misunderstood by nearly all; but in proportion as he has been sincere and true to himself from stage to stage, and from crisis to crisis, he will be a living force in the world when the docile hacks of party have been blown as froth into the void. "I would sooner have the hate of any man than his contempt" was one of his characteristic remarks. And doubtless he was well hated, if also well beloved. Here in Birmingham we are all under the glamour of his name. No man was so loyally loved by a city as he by Birmingham. But it was not so everywhere. A personality of his force and genius must also inspire hate. As water hisses and boils when it touches fire, so certain natures are roused to fierce antagonism when they touch an authoritative and commanding will. Such was his kindling personality. It could not leave men indifferent; it aroused in them an ardour of personal enthusiasm or a strong hostility. He was too fine a fighter, too keen and cutting a debater to expect not to arouse retaliation. A vivid influence like his had to throw all that came into contact with it into some kind of excitement and vitality, either sympathetic or hostile. The one thing it could not do was to leave men unmoved.

But to-day the live energetic form is still, and all hostilities are laid aside. All heads are bowed in one universal respect. Those of us who were not of his following, even those of us who in our own way, however puny and feeble, confronted some of his actions with both moral and political resentment—and I must not forbear to class myself among these—will all join to-day with his most fervent admirers in the Empire's tribute to one of the greatest of her sons. I believe that even the subjects of other nations who loved him least will honour his memory, at any rate as a powerful and magnificently virile personality. There are men, like Cromwell, like Napoleon, like Bismarck, to make a selection from three different nations, who concentrate upon themselves human admiration because of their outstanding genius and iron will. Altogether, apart from approval or disapproval, and even in spite of intensest moral blame, we cannot read of their career without feeling that they have conferred distinction on the human race. Their restless energy, their overmastering ambition, their austerity, and concentration of will, their cold and inflexible resolution—the vastness of their design and the magnitude of the marble they endeavour to hew into shape—all this moves men to a certain admiration which has little or nothing to do with ethical appreciation. Like some grand spectacle of nature—some mighty Alpine height, or some thundering Niagara, we look spell-bound, without asking whether it is good or beautiful. It has something of the overawing power that belongs to the extraordinary and the wonderful. Apart altogether from our moral estimate of the outstanding characters of history, we recognise some of them as belonging to these elemental and titanic forces of humanity. The man whom we remember with mourning to-day was one of these.

He believed in himself, in his capacity to shape men and affairs. He had earned the right to that self-confidence here in Birmingham by his municipal work. It is almost impossible for those of us who are comparative strangers to the city, to realise what Birmingham was like before he touched and transformed it. The extent of his service is probably not known to the younger generation, even of our born citizens. Let me give a quotation from his own description of the state of the city as he found it. "The streets themselves were badly paved, they were imperfectly lighted, they were only partially drained. The footwalks were worse than the streets. You had to proceed either in several inches of mud or in favoured localities you might go upon cobble stones, on which it was a penance to walk. The gas and the water belonged to private monopolies. Gas was supplied at an average rate of 5s. per 1,000 cubic feet. The water was supplied by the company on three days in the week. On other days you must either go without or you must take advantage of the perambulating carts which went round the town and which supplied water from polluted wells at 10s. per 1,000 gallons. You will not be surprised under these circumstances to know that in 1848 the annual mortality was 30 in 1,000. . . . The only wonder is that it was not much greater, because we read of whole streets from which typhus . . . scarlet fever, diphtheria, in their worst forms were never absent. We read of thousands of courts which were not paved, which were not drained, which were covered with pools of stagnant filth. . . . The sewerage of the town was very partial, and in fact to sum up this description it may truly be said that . . . Birmingham, although it was no worse than any of the other great cities of the United Kingdom was a town in which scarcely anything had been done, either for the instruction or for the health, for the recreation, or the comfort, or the convenience of the artisan population."

That is his own description. It shows how far we have travelled since. It shows what can be done through the audacity and the enterprise of one man who had the genius for inspiring business men with confidence and enthusiasm. He did not merely sweep the citizens off their feet with civic patriotism, he convinced cool heads of the commercial soundness of his schemes. His civic reconstruction was almost a revolution in municipal socialism. He purchased the gas works, reduced the price of gas, drew from its provision a profit of between £30,000 and £40,000 a year. He bought up the waterworks, laid out a sewage farm, and cleared some of the worst slum districts at the cost of a loan of £1,600,000, which, it has been said, will prove an investment that in years to come, when the leases fall in, will make Birmingham one of the richest corporations in England.

I said he believed in his capacity to change men and affairs. A civic achievement of this kind should confirm every idealist that it is possible to turn a great dream into a practical reality. When we see the tasks that confront us yet, when we are apt to despair of what seem ever-increasing difficulties and complications, when we are timid of great ventures and shrink from speculating in high civic ideals, let the name of Joseph Chamberlain strike a fire of courage into our hearts and put the iron of resolution and self-sacrifice into our wills. He did not believe that the clash and conflict of selfish interests would result in order and beauty, and health and joy. He was never in that sense an individualist of the laissez faire laissez aller kind. He was not afraid of collective interference. He did not believe that human society was a fortuitous concourse of living atoms. He was not content with a drift of human tendencies. He believed in the strong hand of public authority acting with firmness and a far foresight, and according to pre-arranged plans and designs. If his life teaches us one thing more clearly than another it is the lesson of courage to legislate and to administer for posterity; never to yield to hesitations and criticisms dictated by fear and cowardice, but to plan with a frigid and calculating foresight, with what he himself called a "sagacious audacity," for the time to come, as a landscape gardener anticipates the future, and then to work, work, and for ever work with a passionate energy to fulfil our designs.

It was in accordance with this capacity for foresight and plan that he should give to patriotism a wider meaning than it had before. As far back as 1887 he had said: "I refuse to think or speak of the United States of America as a foreign nation," and in the same speech he gave expression to the idea that afterwards became the central passion of his politics, the idea of the future that awaited the Anglo-Saxon people—to quote his words: "That proud, persistent, self-asserting and resolute stock, that no change of climate or condition can alter, and which is infallibly destined to be the predominating force in the future history and civilisation of the world." In 1888 he dwelt again on the idea of confederation, and said: "I do not think such a scheme impossible."

Whatever some of us may think of his subsequent development of this idea, and of the means advocated for its realisation, we shall all, I hope, see that in itself it possesses real moral grandeur. There is always a beyond to which our city leads. There is a beyond to which our country leads. There is a beyond to which Empire leads. I believe that God has a purpose and providence for the English peoples, as He had for Rome, for Greece, and for Israel. I pray that our Imperial mission may ever be a civilising, moralising, and peaceful one. We must not abdicate from our high Imperial destiny, or use the word "Imperialism" as if it meant only aggression and war and annexation. I believe it has a higher meaning than this. I believe it had a higher meaning for this great apostle of Imperialism. In days to come we shall see that we have more than a world mission. We have a Higher-Worldly mission which cannot be understood or maintained, except as we believe that God has "called" us, and that there is a true sense in which we, too, are an "elect" and a chosen people. He who observes the sparrows fall, and numbers the hairs of your head does not cause the rise and fall of empires for naught. We must fulfil His divine designs, and be the instruments of His will, or be broken in pieces as something unfitted for His Almighty Hand. When we feel that more fully than we do to-day we shall probably know better than we do to-day the fruitful part that Joseph Chamberlain played in quickening for good the wider world-consciousness of England. We shall see her in the centre of a divine destiny, and say with William Watson that God

. . . throned her in the gateways of the world;
He 'established her on high before the peoples.
He raised her as a watch tower from the wave;
He built her as a lighthouse on the waters.
He maketh and unmaketh without end,
And He alone, who is first and last, shall judge her.

And when we think to-day of that dead statesman, silent and still, whom you knew as a flame of energy; when we set his career in the midst of the solemn issues of Life and Death and Eternity, we see how there is none great except God, how, as in Watts' great picture, the glory of man passes—

Passes the world,
The shield and the spear,
The gauntlet and gage:
Pass all the roses,
The book of the scholar,
The lute of the minstrel,
The cup that was quaffed,
The ermine of monarchs.
Nothing abides
Save love that we gave.*

In that solemn world whither all passes, whereby all is justified that is justified we leave him, applying to him the words put into the mouth of a kingly soul:

I have lived my life, and that which I have done
May He within Himself make pure.

THE LAND OF THE EAGLE.

IN an earlier book, "The Burden of the Balkans," written at the close of her sixth tour in the Balkan Peninsula, Miss Durham tried to describe some of the difficulties which the sons of Albania, "the Land of the Eagle," were trying to cope with in their heroic struggle for freedom and independence. "But," she said, "it would take a volume to enter into the endless subterfuges, entanglements, and shufflings by which the external Powers strive to gain their end and the Albanians to outwit the lot." Since then the troubles of the Albanians have increased tenfold. Revolt against the policy of forcible Ottomanisation, which has made the Young Turks almost more loathed than Abdul Hamid, they were speedily embroiled in the final outburst of racial hatreds and religious fanaticism which culminated in the Balkan War, and only learnt when it was too late that they had been used as pawns in a great political game the sordid details of which make shameful reading for civilised Christian nations. What they have been called upon to endure as the result of that terrible period of bloodshed our readers have already learnt from Miss Durham's articles in these columns, and at the present moment they are still reaping, together with their ancient enemies, the Turks, and the other Balkan States whose quarrels are as interminable as their hatred is deep, the bitter fruits of a war which has settled no disputes and wiped out no scores whatever. "To detail the mass of suffering which I myself have witnessed," writes Miss Durham, "would take several volumes of monotonous horror"; and she adds, re-echoing in 1914 with far more intensity of feeling the words uttered nine years ago: "To unravel the complicated mesh of intrigues and lies would be impossible. . . . The present is unspeakably miserable. Whole districts have been purposely depopulated, for the aim of most Balkan States is, so far as possible, to evict members of an alien race. These, hunted out from their lands, and robbed of all they possess, are appealing now urgently for help. Each month has so far brought fresh victims of racial ferocity."

What a text for a Peace propagandist to base his arguments upon—what a revelation of the futility and wastefulness of war as a means of promoting the true welfare of a people! No one, indeed, has shown more clearly than Miss Durham in everything that she has written on this painful subject how foolish it is to suppose that any lasting good can emerge from the brutal and selfish struggles for supremacy in which rival nations engage. And it must be remembered that this lesson is enforced by one who, although she has a woman's pity for suffering in every shape and form, a woman's passionate desire to make the world a sweet and wholesome and happy place for the little children who run so blithely over its ancient battle-fields, has also an eager and adventurous spirit which might well be that of a patriot wielding a valiant sword for the defence of his country. Someone has said that she is always the happy warrior, and no one who reads her latest contribution to the history of events in the Near East will be inclined to dispute that statement. The whole-hearted way in which she has espoused the cause of the Maltsores, or "mountain-men," against the secret enmity of Montenegro, which has undoubtedly been guilty of a great betrayal of faith under the guise of friendship, shows her quality as a fighter; and the attitude which she adopted towards kings and princes, great generals and ministers of state, when they were attempting to enlist her sympathy and support on their own behalf against reason and justice, is by no means that of a passive resister. She can pursue her way quite calmly when bullets are "swishing" overhead and shells exploding on every side; forage for herself and beast, and lie down in soaked garments on bare boards to snatch an hour's heavy slumber like any hardened campaigner. On a night of incomparable magnificence "a-rattle with rifle fire," when she is fleeing with a wild band of soldiers from the Turks, her horse clambering rocks she would not have dared to ride over by daylight, "I kept thinking," she says, "'This is ridiculously like a Book for Boys,' and began to sing." The words have a positively joyous ring, and reveal a courage, almost a gaiety, in the face of death which is simply amazing.

She is no sentimentalist, either, and can describe scenes of horror in curt, unemotional phraseology which makes our craven blood run cold as we read them, nor can she conceal her admiration for brave, if headstrong, men who are by no means willing to knuckle under to tyrannous oppressors or vindictive enemies. But (and herein lies the difference between this "happy warrior" and the man of war) her interest in the conflict she does not shrink from witnessing springs from a deep concern for the fortunes of men in a moral and spiritual sense, and from a passion for righteous dealing which is shown over and over again in these pages. Although in constant danger, she herself never carried arms; it was solely as a peacemaker that she sought to intervene, often half dead with fatigue and anxiety, between the excited insurgents and their hereditary foes when questions of settlement and compensation were talked about—a proceeding which always aroused the suspicions of the tribesmen. No personal animosity perverted her judgment when she was trying to get justice done, and her mind was perfectly free from the selfish greed and fanatical frenzy which did their cruel work only too well as the deadly struggle went on. Actual war, as she witnessed it, for instance, from a little hill at Podgoritz, hearing above the booming of the guns the sheep bells tinkling on the plain below, was wildly exciting, but never quite real, and the part she played in it was merely that of a spectator, holding no brief for Christian or Moslem, until the wounded began to come in. Then her true work started—incessant, exhausting toil, carried on amidst inconceivable discomfort and misery, surrounded by filth, hampered by the lack of necessary equipment and capable helpers, to say nothing of food and clothing, and weighed down by the sickening consciousness that the suffering men she was trying to patch up would only go back to the front once more to fight and fall, and perhaps die in unspeakable torment, mutilated by savage hands beyond recognition. That was the fight Miss Durham waged, a fight against human misery and iniquity so great that even her brave heart almost failed her when she realised how little one pair of hands could do, and what irreparable havoc had been wrought, not only among the wounded, but among the innocent victims of war who wandered about, starving and homeless, and often in danger of massacring hordes, when the blood-lust had left its trail in burnt dwellings and ruined harvests all over the land. For "no lot can be more miserable than that of the luckless human beings who are used as live bait by ambitious rulers."

The glories of war have often been sung, but no mention of them is found in this book. We are faced throughout its pages with nothing but stark realities, and they certainly lend no encouragement to Jingoistic sentiment. But through all the horrors that are calmly, almost baldly described by Miss Durham there sounds a joyous note which can always be detected amidst the hateful discords of life wherever loving hearts give themselves up to the service of mankind. It is the note of faith and hope. For war is destined to come to an end, and such revelations and the feelings they quicken do but bring nearer the day when all enlightened men and women, not merely a handful of humane people with ideas in advance of their time, will realise to the full its hideousness and brutality, and learn to control the selfish instincts that give birth to the desire to kill. Pity so profound is in itself a creative force, and for us the spectacle of this "Queen of the Mountain-men," as Miss Durham is called in Albania, with all her natural detestation of dirt and disorder, and disease, and physical violence, devoting herself month after weary month to the task of succouring the helpless and despairing in a land that has been made desolate indeed, is one to stir the heart and make one very sure of the upward progress of humanity. It is such clear evidence of the triumph, not merely of mind over matter, but of the deathless spirit that is in man over mind and matter alike.

THE WELL-SPRING OF LIFE.

WELL-SPRING of God within me, Fountain of purity to my thoughts, Source of all my nobler being, River of never-ceasing righteousness, thou makest thine own channels in the desert places of my helpless wanderings, and bringest new thoughts to life beside the water-courses.

O blessed Streams! O Well-spring of my life divine, most holy River, most sacred Fountain, flow thou still within me!

Pour on and on thy streams of righteous judgments. Fill all my evil channels of word or deed with thy divine rebuke, and let the force of thy hatred, thine anger, thy righteous indignation and contempt still fill all evil channels of my life with the strong mercy of thy chastisements.

Let me feel ashamed in the cleansing floods of thy holy life flowing, flowing, ever flowing within me.

Let me grow weary of wickedness beneath the heavy and endless pressure of thy Presence, pouring still and ever pouring, fresh and clear, pure streams of divine thought—the Love and the goodness of God, deep, clear and transparent in my life.

Let thy life, O blessed and loving God, flow evermore through mine; and give my inmost soul to drink for ever the thoughts of my God.

Let me sit by the stream of daily righteousness as hour by hour the thoughts of my God flow through me.

Let me stand and gaze into the river of God. Let all my affections be cleansed and purified by the waters of the river of the Life of God within me.

Let me bring to this river in the soul all my friends and dear ones, and all my daily conduct towards them. Let me stand with them around me by the deep well-spring of the lovingkindness that thou dost show me.

Let me look into the waters of thy pure life, my God. Let me gaze deep in thine eyes; let me see myself as I am. Be thou the mirror wherein I see and judge myself truly and justly and very lovingly hour by hour—as thou seest me, my God.

WILFRED HARRIS.

SORROW AND JOY.

As Mansoul went along the highway there met him Sorrow, weeping piteously. "Oh, hear me!" she cried; "listen to my sad story. Darkness is over me. Happiness is gone for ever out of all the world."

"Come with me," said Mansoul.

As they went Sorrow kept on weeping and pouring out her plaint. Then they met a child carrying a cake, which it held to its breast wrapped in an apron. "I am Joy," said the child. "May I come with you?"

Mansoul took the hand of Joy, and the three walked on together. Sorrow, however, protested, begging that Mansoul would think only of her, and saying that Joy was a fraud. But Joy laughed and said, "Where can sorrow be when the sun is shining, and there are two larks singing in the blue sky, and my comrades are at play in the meadow, and I have a great cake?"

So neither would hear talk of the other, but they went on walking on either side of Mansoul till they came to a spring of bitter waters called the Fountain of Trouble. Then Mansoul plucked a branch from a tree of exceeding liveliness and beauty, which grew near at hand, and casting it therein the waters become sweet. Whereat Sorrow was moved with wonder, and, stooping, filled her flask afresh.

"Give us now of thy cake," said Mansoul to the child, "and we will also moisten our lips with a few drops from the flask of Sorrow."

Then Joy unwrapped the cake and divided it between them.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

THE DECLINE IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

II.

In trying to find a reason for the decline of public worship, it is easy to lose one's way without discovering anything. There are so many possible reasons for the problem that it is almost impossible to follow any one of them and say, if we could solve this our difficulties would be overcome. Public worship has gone out of fashion, and, although a multitude of explanations why it has gone are at hand, none of them are satisfactory. Reason rarely can explain the changing fashions of time. We are face to face with an undeniable fact, that there is a decline in church membership and the attendances at public worship.

It is pointed out that the working classes and the intellectual classes are alienated from the churches; the working classes because they find the churches useless institutions for the removal of social conditions which oppress and offend them, the intellectual classes because they find the churches bound to dogmas which are hurtful and displeasing. We all come in contact with people who give these reasons for abstaining from public worship. Nevertheless, they fail to account for the fact. There are people who find these the very reasons which induce them to participate in public worship. There are working people who find in church fellowship a means of escape from class distinctions and social restrictions. In most congregations there are overworked and underpaid men and women who find in our religious fellowship a sphere for the development and enjoyment of the social faculties which otherwise would be starved and uncultivated. There are also others who were formerly Rationalists, who have found their scientific studies quite unequal to the supply of their nature's demand for a deeper and fuller experience of life. If the churches that are free from dogmas were successful, and only those in bondage to them were declining, then it might be said that hurtful doctrines account for the position; but such is not the case, and the explanation falls to the level of an excuse which covers up the real reason.

There is a great deal of truth in the proposition that much of the paraphernalia connected with church organisation is discounted by the competition now offered by other institutions. Our young people can find better facilities for mental culture and physical development outside the churches. After all, these things are merely the side-shows of the churches, and their loss of prestige in no way affects the essential value of public worship. Without doubt, many of the churches suffer from the incubus of officialdom. Various influences result in the wrong men reaching the important places in our organisations and the right men being left out, but this is also true of other institutions which are successful. The influences of pushing personalities and money interests work throughout society, and are not peculiar to religious circles. Without doubt also there is a disinclination on the part of men and women (already heavily taxed with responsibilities) to take on voluntary duties such as the obligations of church membership entail.

But while all these things are associated with the problem, they none of them nor all of them account for it. What made the stalwart Unitarian of the last century is making the non-churchman of this. The orthodox religious believer of the last century was a pronounced bigot, and when under various influences he became converted he fell in love with liberty. He fought and suffered for his new love; but just as with money it is possible to have too much of a good thing, so the people of to-day have become surfeited with liberty. They are inordinately fond of it. The modern interpretation of liberty is licence, and there is consequently a disinclination among the masses to shoulder responsibilities of any kind. This is at the bottom of the problem. We moderns are enervated and the churches make our religious exercises easy for us. The hours of worship are shortened, the accommodation for it is made comfortable, and our subscriptions are called for in small instalments. It has become the primary business of an up-to-date church committee to devise easy means for the maintenance of our spiritual privileges. What we moderns need is bracing up—and the church that will ultimately survive will be the one that persists in making rigorous demands. The churches are holding their first principles too loosely, and have too tight a grip on things of secondary importance. If we are to ultimately overcome the tendency of the age, we must give up catering for it. Ask for more and offer less. We must make a beginning with the organisation, overhaul the machinery, and place the first things conspicuously in the church's programme. We have to persuade our skilled enthusiasts to pour their enthusiasms into public worship, instead of dissipating their energies on side-shows. It is a serious waste of power to employ the genius for organisation and enterprise in arranging details for a social evening while the Sunday services languish for lack of interest. Men will often spend a deal of time and talent in work of this kind and then find themselves too busy or too tired for the hour of worship. It cannot be right for men to so wear themselves out with details that they are unfitted for the primary function of the church. A revival would soon be brought about if the "educationalist" and "social reformer" were to employ the energy they spend on the popular adult class and the P.S.A. platform in instructing the children in the Sunday school. While we are so busy catering for the fickle public our schools are being starved.

The Sunday school is one of the big things of the church, and must be placed among the things of first importance. It must absorb the talents and zeal of the church members. We need not new agencies for work, but we do need our existing agencies strengthened and brought up to date. It is comparatively easy to get hold of an intelligent and enterprising business man to organise a social function; it is extremely difficult to get him to put the same amount of time and skill into teaching a class in the school. Yet a change like this is precisely what will have to take place before a revival of interest in public worship can happen. The brains and the pockets of the churches are being poured out to the crowds already appealed to by Sunday concerts and cinemas, instead of being used for the harder and more profitable work of feeding God's lambs.

To save themselves from decline the churches require to be restored to a clear idea of what they want to do in the world. They are suffering from too broad a point of view, and have become a little bit of everything, and not much of anything—a little bit in politics; a little bit in philanthropy; a little bit in social reform; a little bit in theology, teaching, praying, and preaching. It must be exceedingly difficult for an outsider to decide which a particular church counts chief in importance. My proposition is that the only hopeful way of facing the problem of public worship is for the churches to set themselves to the task of placing in their organisations and enterprises first things first in importance.

Dr. Hunter some years ago in an address to a conference of Free Churches said: "It is good to hear a church praised for its humanitarian zeal and activity, or for its wise and helpful teaching and preaching, but the best thing that can be said of it is that those who tread its courts are drawn thither mostly by love of its prayers and praises, of its devotional observances and associations—which quicken and nourish holy aspiration and purpose, and are the channel of influences which inspire and hallow the life. The history of mankind makes it clear that what we call public worship is not of human invention but of human nature, that deeper and diviner nature which is 'begotten, not made.'" We ought to spend our talents and strength in making the Sunday services representative of the highest thoughts and noblest emotions of our times. Of course, the churches can do good work by institutional and philanthropic agencies, but they should be secondary and not primary in importance. Our services must meet and satisfy the yearnings of the soul. There is little need to-day for the churches to supply the means for education or recreation, the municipalities are doing it, and doing it better than we can. We want to concentrate our powers upon the spiritually stimulating and strengthening of men, thus fitting them for good work in the world.

What men need is what men have always needed—spiritual power for service in the everyday life. The reason why people are getting adrift from the churches is because this power is not manifest in our public services. We are prone to imagine that right thinking or right actions are substitutes for spiritual power, and are more concerned about getting our ideas accepted, or our particular enterprises supported, than we are about getting men and women into a right attitude of mind and heart towards God and men. We expect the services to meet our private tastes, inclinations, and desires, rather than value them as sacred opportunities for communion of spirit and fellowship with God. We do not gather together to surrender ourselves to the Highest, but to get from the church the best sermons or music we can expect. We have to reverse the order. The church must have its altar restored to it. I do not mean the Communion Table, but the public worship which demands from us all we have and are, and demands it for the service of God. The demand of the church must be for absolute surrender to the will of God. Service must not be called for the honour of a denomination, or for the glory of a creed, but for the whole life-devotion of each man to his God. The predominant feature about public worship must be this self-surrender, and nothing else must be allowed to overshadow it.

THE SANCTITY OF CHURCH MUSIC.

The Sanctity of Church Music. By the Rev. Francis Forth. London: J. & J. Bennett. 2s. 6d. net.

THE important thing in Mr. Forth's book is a strong plea for founding a school of music specially for the benefit of the clergy of the Church of England. That ministers of religion of all denominations would be all the better fitted for the conduct of public worship if they had a sufficient knowledge of music to give them an authoritative voice in the musical portion of the services goes without saying. The exercise of this function would doubtless require a large measure of tact and consideration. Organists and choirs are super-sensitive people, and require handling with care. But much can be done by courteous suggestion and friendly consultation without falling back on authority. Only the minister must have knowledge, and the number of ministers who confess that they have no ear for music is appalling. Yet everyone knows that this is due, not to any natural defect, but simply to want of training. Many a man who declares he has no ear for music can quite accurately distinguish the note of every bird of the air. By all means let us have a school of music for ministers of religion.

The rest of Mr. Forth's little book does not appeal to us. That there is a peculiar quality about Gregorian tones which gives them a special sanctity of their own; that Early Church music of all kinds shares in this sanctity because it was composed by priests; that organists who are Anglicans are to be severely blamed when they accept appointments in Nonconformist chapels, are statements that only provoke amusement in any one with a gift of humour. The historical survey of church music given by Mr. Forth has been better done elsewhere.

HOME PRAYERS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE. By the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A. London: Sunday School Association. 1s.

To write prayers for children of various ages, from infancy to adolescence, is not an easy task. It requires a wide range of sympathy, a certain delicacy of feeling and touch, combined with a simplicity which is free from childishness. That Mr. Tarrant has succeeded so well ought to ensure for his book a place in every home where there are children. It supplies a long-felt want, and will be welcomed by many mothers.

A WRITING LESSON.

WHEN we speak of a man as a good writer, we do not, as you all know, mean one who can write beautifully with a pen in a fine copybook style, and, as many printers would tell you, it is not often that the authors of books do write like that. If you go to the British Museum and see the way in which some of our great works of literature have been written, you will agree with me that most school teachers would give very low marks indeed if any of their pupils handed in a piece of composition written so badly. Before the invention of printing it was very different; the writers were writers in both senses, those that composed poems or essays inscribed them in a beautiful and very ornamental hand upon vellum, and I daresay you have seen some of their work. When printing became common, good handwriting was not valued so highly, men thought it was quite sufficient if they wrote just well enough for the printer to read, and now the invention of the typewriter has made a good hand still more rare. Yet, while it is always nice to see beautiful penmanship, and it is good to put our best into all our work, there is one thing more important than the method we use in expressing ourselves, and that is the message we want to give. A sentence of death, for instance, would not be any better because it was written like copperplate, and I am sure you think far more of the loving words which are in a letter from your father and mother than of the lack of beauty in the writing. If you examined the manuscripts of some of the books written by a man like Thomas Carlyle (which you can see at his house in Cheyne-row, Chelsea) or Charles Lamb, you might perhaps say: "Why, I could write much better than that," and, if writing is simply making letters of a good shape, you would be quite right; but, if it means, as it usually does, giving a message to the world, you would have to be a little more modest.

I never remember coming across a boy or girl who really owned that they wrote badly. They do not mind it being known that they cannot do fractions very easily and that they are generally weak in arithmetic, but they usually admire their own writing. I am afraid I was the same. But how different that writing looks when we get older! About two years ago I happened to have returned to me a letter which I wrote before I was eight years old. I am sure I thought the handwriting was beautiful at the time, but what poor stuff it looks now! With most of us some of the things we have written in the records of our lives look just as weak, I fear. How I used, for instance, to love flourishes in my writing when I was about fifteen. I remember that when I first wrote in my father's ledgers I used to try hard to make flourishes as beautiful as the accountant who came to check the books. I thought I succeeded after a lot of practice on pieces of scrap paper, but now when I look I can see there is as much difference between my letters and his as there was at school between the top line of the copybook and my lines which followed. The fact is that flourishes do not make the writing a bit more clear, and, after all, the great object of writing is to be read. And it is easy to see every day boys and girls who are merely making flourishes in life; they are taking a great deal of trouble over things that are of no importance and are sometimes harmful. Boys are very anxious to smoke as often as possible simply because they think it is manly, or even sometimes to swear because it sounds "big," and girls think of nothing but having more beautiful hair than some other girl or wearing a dress or perhaps a bracelet which is bound to attract attention. This is to make the mistake of those schoolboys and schoolgirls who, instead of keeping their eyes on the specimen line set them to copy, look only at their own lines above or at the way someone else is writing. The best plan is for us to study men like Jesus, whose lives have been regarded as patterns for hundreds of years by very large numbers of people.

In learning to write we have to commence right at the beginning, and most of us started by making pot-hooks until we grew tired of tracing the same forms. Man commenced very simply, too; probably he started by trying to draw a scene of what we should now write about, and hunting incidents have been found carved on rocks and on stags' horns which are thousands of years old. In Egypt, too, they had a wonderful system of picture writing. An eye, for instance, with a sceptre under it meant the king, or kingly power, and a half circle on a horizontal would probably be used for the sun rising or setting. This kind of writing was not quickly done, I expect, but it was quite plain for the Egyptians, and I daresay it would be more easily read by very little children than a printed book to-day. There is here a little parable for us. We cannot preach or write books yet, but it is quite possible for us to give out a lesson of love all the same. Cheerful looks and a kind smile may be quite a picture-book to other people, and one quite as plain for them to understand as anything we might speak or write. I have spoken at a number of children's services, and I can still remember the faces of some boys and girls in services that were held years ago; they were so attentive and so eager to listen that they were a great help to me, and became beautiful picture messages in my mind.

Probably most of us would like very much to write words that would be read by people for hundreds of years to come, like the words of Shakespeare, and of some of the old monks whose beautiful books may be seen in our museums. Perhaps we have not very much hope of that, but we can at any rate see that what we do write would be worth reading. Let us take care not to write anything so terrible as Tom Tulliver in George Eliot's story, "The Mill on the Floss." Tom's father had owned a mill, but another man, by going to law, had been able to get it into his possession, and Mr. Tulliver had to be a servant where for years he had been master. So he told his son to get the great family Bible down one night, and to write "I don't forgive Wakem, and for all I'll serve him honest I wish evil may befall him." So Tom Tulliver wrote that, and added a sentence to say that if he had the chance he would work his revenge; and then he signed his name. What a terrible thing to write in the front of a book which contains so much about forgiveness, and tells us of Jesus asking forgiveness for his enemies even upon the cross! Who would have been glad to read those words in years to come? How different were the fine words which Captain Scott scribbled with his pencil in the antarctic regions, and how the simple story of his companions' last days stirred us when we read them.

A well-known writer has given us an interesting example of how a man's name, written as people often write them to-day on castle walls or monuments, lasted far longer than he could ever have imagined, and was really quite useful. In the year of the great Revolution, 1688, a man named Robert Hedges went into a cave, now called Kent's Hole, near Torquay, and cut his name, and in 1825 a Roman Catholic clergyman found it there and left a record of the appearance of the letters.

He described to what extent the letters had been covered by the layers of stalagmite, and thus, by working a proportion sum, it was possible, through the action of that unknown man so long dead, to discover how very long it must have taken for the whole of the stalagmite floor in the cave to form, and how many thousands of years old the cave must be. A simple, perhaps thoughtless action, but what an interesting and important result! People may judge us by actions just as seemingly trivial. I remember myself for years thinking certain grown-ups I knew were very cross and unpleasant kind of people because of something they said to me which I am quite sure they could never have remembered. If we want to write a good straight line in our copy books we must look ahead, and take care where we are going, and if we want to make our lives of service to other people we must remember that what we are writing into our own lives will be read by others, and perhaps remembered long after we have forgotten them. Sometimes we write with indelible ink so that the writing cannot be rubbed out, but we never know in life whether our mistakes at any time can be erased. How careful we ought to be, then, to make only those impressions that we should be glad to retain while life lasts.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

THE LATE MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN.

THE death of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain on Thursday, July 2, at his London residence, has removed one of the most dominating personalities of modern times, a man whose influence has had a marked effect upon the destinies of the British Empire, though that influence began to diminish even before the fatal seizure which ended his political activities eight years ago. The details of his life have been so fully recorded in the newspapers, and the importance of his work as a great municipal reformer and an Imperialist, whose dreams of Empire had a touch of grandeur, was so admirably summed up in the sermon preached last Sunday by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, which appears in this issue, that it is scarcely necessary to do more than briefly chronicle here the chief events in a career which was marked by some extraordinary successes, though it drew to a close through a long period of suffering and invalidism the pathos of which touched the hearts of his fiercest political enemies as well as his most devoted friends.

A lifelong Unitarian, Mr. Chamberlain boasted that he could claim descent from one of the 2,000 ejected ministers who were driven by the Act of Uniformity in 1662 from the Church of England. He was born on July 8, 1836, at 3, Grove Hill-terrace, Camberwell. His father, Joseph Chamberlain, senior, was a boot and shoe manufacturer in the City, and the boy who bore the same name was the eldest of a large family consisting of six sons and three daughters. While he was still a lad they all moved to 25, Highbury-place, Islington, and the future politician became a day-boarder at a private school in Canonbury-square, passing at the age of 14 to University College School. He was only 16 when his education was supposed to be completed, and he entered his father's business. At the age of 18, after a brief experience of commercial life and methods in London, he went to Birmingham, where his father was taking an active part in some new enterprises in conjunction with the Nettlefolds, the well-known firm of wood screw-makers in Birmingham, to whom he was related by marriage. This was the beginning of Mr. Chamberlain's long association with the city in the Midlands where his best work for his country was done. He devoted himself to business for twenty years, and at the end of that time, having amassed a considerable fortune, resolved to give himself entirely to public life. He now entered, at the age of 38, upon that fruitful period which gave to England one of her most zealous, capable, and practical municipal reformers. He had already taken an active part in Birmingham politics and social debates, but from this time onward he was to utilise his marvellous powers of organisation and his ability to compel the co-operation of hard-headed business men, and inspire them with new conceptions of civic responsibility, in planning far-reaching schemes for lighting his native town, for supplying it with pure water, for clearing slum districts, for laying out fine streets, and in every way not only improving the conditions of life but enriching the corporation at the same time.

He was now to embrace a wider vision of usefulness, spurred on by a sense of the duty which a successful man owes to his country, and influenced also, as subsequent events seem to show clearly, by personal ambitions which he felt himself strong enough to realise. At the age of 40 he became one of the Members of Parliament for Birmingham, Mr. George Dixon's seat falling to him without opposition in 1876, and soon made his mark in the House of Commons. Mr. Chamberlain was at this time a decided Radical, a great believer (as, indeed, he always was, though his views changed so much in other respects) in party and the machinery of party. He preached the gospel of social reform with no uncertain voice, and some of his speeches, read in the light of a later day, sound revolutionary enough, though perhaps they are not really more so than the ideas which towards the close of his life won the applause of many who would at that time have condemned his policy root and branch. From this time onward, through all that strenuous time when he fought Mr. Gladstone on the Home Rule question until the final dramatic split which separated them utterly; through the terrible days of the Parnell Commission up to the return of the Unionists to power in 1895, when Mr. Chamberlain became Colonial Secretary; on to the Boer War, with all its humiliations and tragedies, and the fierce clash of party strife that intensified a struggle which to all thoughtful people seemed hateful and needless, until, finally, the tremendous vitality and indomitable purpose of this great politician found its last outlet in the attempt, following his momentous visit to South Africa, to inaugurate a new era of Imperial consolidation—all these things are common knowledge, and have provided matter for burning controversy for many a long year. In the lurid light of such stirring events Mr. Chamberlain has always stood out as pre-eminently a fighter, and not, therefore, so far as the public was concerned, as one who brought reconciliation and peace to his fellow men. His amiability, courtesy, and genuine kindness were reserved for his own family and intimate friends, and for the citizens of Birmingham who mourn him so sincerely and have reason to remember him so affectionately. The time came when the incisive and ruthless debater was to suffer a complete eclipse of his power as administrator and Imperialist, and all animosity died out in the hearts of his Parliamentary opponents when they saw him enter the House of Commons on the occasion of his last sad visit in 1910. Supported by Mr. Austen Chamberlain and Lord Morpeth, he managed to take the oath and sign the roll with extreme difficulty—a mere wreck of the brilliant orator of the Gladstonian period who had withered his foes with fierce denunciation in many a stormy debate.

The funeral service, which was held at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, where Mr. Chamberlain once taught in the Sunday school, was conducted by Dr. L. P. Jacks. There was no address, and the proceedings were marked by great simplicity. The liturgy used was one which is very familiar to members of the King's Chapel, Boston, U.S.A., which has been attended by so many leading New England families, including the one to which Mrs. Chamberlain (who was a Miss Endicott,) belongs. The offer of burial in Westminster Abbey had been declined, and the interment took place at the Key Hill Cemetery in the presence of a small company of relatives, the general public being only admitted when the brief ceremony was over.

THE LATE REV. R. H. TAVENER.

WE deeply regret to announce the sudden and tragic death of the Rev. R. H. Tavenor, who was drowned while bathing at Borrowdale last Monday. Mr. Tavenor was staying with the Rev. V. D. Davis, whose son, David, had gone down to the river with him, to bathe before breakfast. Mr. Davis was watching them from a boat moored at the side. It appears that Mr. Tavenor, who was always somewhat heedless of warnings about overtaxing himself, suddenly began to splash about, but this did not at first alarm the others, who attributed it to exuberant spirits. Almost immediately afterwards, however, he sank down to the bottom of a deep pool, from which he was only extricated with considerable difficulty. He was put into the boat in an unconscious condition, and rowed to the other side, where a doctor was at once sent for and every effort made to restore him by artificial respiration, but without avail. The funeral took place in Rosthwaite Churchyard on Wednesday afternoon, the Rev. V. D. Davis conducting the service. We shall publish a memorial notice by Mr. Davis next week.

A correspondent writes:—"Although Mr. Tavenor had settled so recently in Manchester, he had won the admiration and affection of his own people at Willert-street and of a large circle of other friends. His buoyancy and eagerness, together with a keen interest in the personality of those about him, and especially his love of children, were already giving great promise of power and influence. He had a most exalted faith in Domestic Mission work, and an ideal of a missionary's duties which never allowed him to spare himself and his efforts. There is universal sorrow in Manchester circles at the loss of so bright a force from their midst. The memorial service at Willert-street on Sunday evening, July 12, will be conducted by the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., Vice-President of the Domestic Mission Society.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

CONFERENCE OF SOCIAL SERVICE UNIONS AT SWANWICK. DISCUSSIONS ON "LAND AND LABOUR."

"How do you account for the extreme cheerfulness one finds at Swanwick?" was the remark of a newcomer, overheard on one of the early days of the gathering, and the answer was supplied by a word spoken in the Friends' devotional meeting on Wednesday morning, referring to the article on the Salvation Army by A. G. G., in which he said: "They have found the secret of fellowship which makes them supremely happy."

This joy of the Salvation Army is perhaps the highest manifestation yet known of church fellowship, but the uniqueness of the Swanwick fellowship is that it exists alongside with the widest divergence of theological opinion, and is, nevertheless, intensely real. As Dr. Gore said on Sunday afternoon, we have hitherto had little intercourse with our fellow-Christians, and have opened our hearts very little about things we most cared for, but now we have repented, and are moving towards a new spiritual unity, through which—though still, alas, divided in communion—we find it possible to associate in effort and in thought. We realise that we must also learn to speak and act together if Christianity is to have any effect on the progress of our national life.

The other addresses at the united gathering on Sunday afternoon were by Father Plater, S.J., and the Rev. Dr. Garvie, both noteworthy contributions. Father Plater spoke of the social spirit as more important even than social construction; he remarked that "heaven" was greater than machinery, and emphasised this by reference to the striking success of the "spiritual retreat" movement for working men in England, as well as on the Continent. He also advocated study circles, which were showing good results under the auspices of the Catholic Social Guild. Dr. Garvie reminded us that all industry was partnership with God, but said that He was too often regarded as a sleeping partner, and recognition of His help confined to harvest festivals. Referring to the subject chosen for study this year, he said we knew the will of God to be that the most should be got out of both land and labour in the three aspects of: (1) the utmost natural productivity, (2) the greatest social utility, (3) the fullest moral and spiritual development possible. Soon after the Bishop began his address, there was a large influx of young men, the members of Adult Schools in the neighbourhood, who had walked over from a distance of several miles to take part in this truly "inspirational" gathering.

The discussion proper began on Saturday night with a paper by Mr. H. G. Wood, M.A., on the "Restoration of Arcady," and was continued through the week, each morning at 10 and each afternoon at 5, with the exception of Wednesday, when the afternoon and evening were given up to sports and prize giving, followed by an entertainment consisting of music and recitations from Mrs. Percy Dearmer's play of "Brer Rabbit."

On the second Sunday afternoon another united meeting was held, and addressed by Mr. J. St. George Heath, the new Warden of Toynbee Hall.

Our first Chairman was Dr. Carlyle, of Oxford, who introduced the question for the week by saying that only those who cared knew how great was the complexity and difficulty of all social problems, but that in the last resort they were all one, and the root of the trouble was that through want of faith men and churches had failed to grasp the connection between civilisation and religion. The problem of the agricultural labourer was an urban problem, too, and the conditions were in many cases even worse than those in towns, but hope was dawning, and it was beginning to be felt that the evils were not irremediable.

Mr. H. G. Wood showed how the same causes that produced the industrial revolution had also been at work in the country districts, e.g., production on a large scale, and the consequent growing gulf between employer and employed, and the substitution of a cash nexus for the old-time bonds of friendship between master and man. Like many subsequent speakers, Mr. Wood pointed the moral of Denmark, which, at a national crisis, had risen to the height of its opportunity, and established a system of agriculture and of rural education which had made it the envy of the world.

Professor Ashley, of Birmingham University, gave us the "Approach from History," pointing out that the acknowledged unsatisfactory condition of agricultural labour, here and now, was not due to the special selfishness of any class or classes, but was the outcome of the social and political movements of the last 500 years, and these he proceeded to trace with a masterly hand. In the subsequent discussion Dr. Carlyle answered the question which had been rising in many minds as to the value of such a historical survey for present purposes, beyond the "increase in charity" which the Professor had inculcated—and he found it in the fact that as conditions follow one another, their causes must be temporary, and the present system was no more bound to be everlasting than others had been; indeed, new factors, such as co-operation and Free Trade, were already tending to modify the outlook as it existed a generation or two ago.

At this point a welcome was given from the Chair to a Swiss gentleman, who came with a cordial invitation to the members of the School to attend the International Conference of Social Service Reformers, to be held at Basle in July of this year. He appealed to them in the name of social justice and religious fraternity, and said that as social problems were now international, the solutions must be international also.

Mr. George Edwardes, on whom has fallen the mantle of Joseph Arch, spoke next from personal experience of the hard life of the agricultural labourer, and welcomed the spirit of discontent which was now spreading over the land. He ended with an appeal to the Christian churches to lend a helping hand to the cause of rural emancipation; "if they do not, their days are numbered."

At the other extreme, politically, was Mr. Christopher Turnor, the Conservative landowner, whose address on Wednesday morning was extraordinarily interesting. As Dr. Carlyle said at its close, we were getting behind party divisions as well as religious differences, and it was a most refreshing experience.

Time and space fail for speaking in any detail of the rest of the programme, but the addresses when published will be found fully as interesting as those of the last two summer schools. What may well be the most important outcome of the Conference remains, however, to be told. There were many meetings which were not on the programme, among them one on the Collegium, presided over by the Rev. William Temple, the new rector of St. James's, Piccadilly; another on the women's movement, with Dr. Carlyle in the chair, and the Rev. Percy Dearmer, Mrs. Higgs, and Mrs. Mackenzie as speakers; and the various Unions had their special gatherings. At our own it was decided that the time had come for a paid organising secretary to be appointed.

But the question that aroused most interest throughout the ten days of the session was that of local interdenominationalism. A large meeting was held, and the subject enthusiastically discussed, and at its close a sub-committee was appointed to draft a report embodying the suggestions that had been made. This report will be submitted to the Central Interdenominational Committee, and if approved by them will then be circulated to the different Unions, and it is hoped that considerable local activity will be the result.

One more important point remains to be noted, viz., that after an exhaustive discussion by the Central Committee of the reasons for and against holding the school annually, it was unanimously agreed that it must certainly be held next year, in any case, and "The Hayes," was therefore at once secured for the week beginning June 26, 1915.

SOUTH AFRICAN NOTES.

THE RELIEF OF INDIAN GRIEVANCES—A NEW FREE RELIGIOUS PEACE ASSOCIATION—OPENING OF THE CHURCH HALL AT JOHANNESBURG.

THE Indian question, about which I wrote in my last letter, which has so long been disturbing both South Africa and India, has at last been settled, at least for the time being. General Smuts announced in the House of Assembly on Tuesday last that both the Indian and the Home Government had agreed to accept the recommendations of the Solomon Commission as a solution of the difficulty, and he therefore moved the second reading of a Bill which would give effect to the recommendations. The £3 tax would be abolished, and one wife for each married Indian would be recognised and admitted to South Africa, even though the marriage might have been solemnised according to polygamous rites. These were the chief points in dispute. There are others on which the Government was prepared to compromise, but much will depend on the way in which the laws affecting Indians are administered in the future. The settlement does not carry with it the right of free migration, even of South African-born Indians, from Natal to other parts of South Africa. The Indian difficulty will, therefore, remain in Natal, where, as I pointed out in my last letter, the Indians largely outnumber the European population. Mr. Boydell, a Natal Labour member, pointed out that in the tailoring, upholstering, tinsmithing, and French polishing trades the Indian was ousting the European workman out of the country owing to the low standard of life, and, therefore, of wages, which the Indian is willing to accept. He suggested the advisability of providing inducements, including monetary compensation, to encourage the Indian population to return to their native country, and absolutely forbidding any further importation of indentured Indian labour. General Smuts intimated that such inducements might be forthcoming, and that the Government would go a long way in favouring such a policy.

We are trying to establish a Peace Association here on a somewhat different basis from those which are already established in Europe and America, that is, on not merely a political, but a definitely ethical and religious basis. Readers of THE INQUIRER may remember that under the South African Defence Act every youth on attaining the age of seventeen must register himself for defence purposes. If a sufficient number in any district do not come forward to enrol themselves voluntarily for defence work and training, a ballot may be taken, and those whose names are drawn in the ballot must serve compulsorily for the allotted time (several weeks in each year). The only exception allowed under the Act is that of those who belong to a religious organisation which has sacred and conscientious objections to war or to the taking of human life. This, of course, only covers the members of the Society of Friends. But there are a great many people, in addition to the Friends, who have sacred and conscientious objections to war and the taking of human life, but who do not belong to any church or religious organisation which makes this declaration a condition of membership. We are, therefore, starting this Free Religious Peace Association here with the object of providing a religious home for such people, and thus enabling them to escape from what we believe to be the unethical requirements of the Defence Act. The Association will be absolutely undenominational. Men and women of any creed, race, or colour may join. I quote the Declaration of Membership in full as it may be of service to our friends in Australia and New Zealand, and even in Great Britain, if the conscriptionists get their way:—

"I believe that love to God and love to man is the supreme principle of religious life, and I will strive to practise that principle in my daily life and in my relations to others.

"I believe that the commandments—

"Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you";

"Love thy neighbour as thyself";

"Thou shalt not kill"— are sacred, and I, therefore, pledge myself never to take or destroy human life intentionally, but rather to do all in my power to defend, foster, and preserve it.

"I believe that these commandments are as binding upon nations as upon individuals, and that no plea of necessity or of policy can release me from paramount allegiance to them. I will, therefore, do all in my power to promote the brotherhood of man and the fraternity of races and nations, and the settlement of all disputes by peaceful methods; and I undertake not to engage in, or willingly train for, any military service which has for its object the carrying on of war, nor will I willingly aid or assist in the conveyance of soldiers, arms, or ammunition, or in any preparations for war."

Whether the Government will accept this declaration as exempting from service in the Defence Force is at present uncertain. It would be well advised to do so, for the people who would sign such a declaration would only join the Defence Force under protest, would perform the duties imposed upon them unwillingly, and in time of war would either refuse to shoot, or shoot over the heads of the enemy. The Declaration brings up the whole question of the conflict between the individual's religious conception of his duty to the State, and the State's conception of what that duty should be. Tolstoi, the Pacifist, and the Society of Friends hold that the realisation of their conception would bring about a higher order of communal or collective life, in which all will be "members of one body in Christ," as Paul says. The time will come when it will seem as immoral and stupid for States to drill, arm, and march large bodies of men to a particular place in order to kill their fellow men as it seems now for two individuals to march to a particular place to fight a duel. The absurdity will be all the more pronounced when International courts are established for the settlement of disputes between nations. Meanwhile, it would seem to be a great mistake even for militarist States to set themselves in conflict with the deep religious convictions of their own citizens. The better way is surely to accept whatever apparent temporary disadvantage to the militarist State the growth of Pacifism may involve, in the knowledge that religious ideals will bring their own fructification, or their own undoing. "If this counsel or this work be of men (alone) it will be overthrown: but if it is of God, ye will not be able to overthrow them; lest haply ye be found to be fighting against God." At any rate few people would be bold enough to say that the Quaker movement has been a weakness in our English national life, and there is no reason why the rights of exemption from military service which have been granted to members of the Society of Friends should not be extended to all who conscientiously object to such service.

The new Church Hall in Johannesburg was opened on Friday evening, June 5, the opening ceremony taking the form of a short religious service, followed by a social meeting. The opening hymn was written by Mr. Hall, and sung to the tune of the National Anthem. The Mayor, Mr. Norman Anstey, performed the opening ceremony, and the Rev. J. Aldridge (Congregationalist) took part in the service. It is gratifying to know that Mr. Hall is rapidly winning the confidence and esteem of all the members of the church. Johannesburg, as we all know, is "stony ground," but with a loyal congregation Mr. Hall is likely to do good work. I notice, in the same newspaper which contains the report of the opening of the Church, that a Church of England clergyman in Johannesburg announces his resignation on the ground that "people are becoming more and more materialistic. The Church doesn't count. I can't say that the people are irreligious. They are indifferent. The parson has to spend a great portion of his time in getting money together. I have come to the conclusion that the condition of things is hopeless, so I am going." But that is a policy of despair. If every minister were to follow this example, what would become of Johannesburg and like places? But it is all the more reason why we should give Mr. Hall and his congregation every support in our power.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.

THE fifteenth annual meeting of the Ministerial Fellowship was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, July 1, and was attended by 50 members. In the unavoidable absence of the President (the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, M.A.) through family affliction, the chair was occupied by the senior ex-president, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. Ten new members were elected, bringing the number on the roll up to 218, every year having shown steady progress in this respect.

The annual report told of £665 having been distributed in benefit since the formation of the society, besides grants of £451 from the benevolent fund, and additional sums from private sources raised by its instrumentality. A further investment had been made, bringing the total capital account to £778 9s. A second donation of £50 to the benevolent fund had been received from "One of the Brethren."

The loss by death of the Revs. Jenkyn Thomas, J. Worsley Austin, William Harrison, and George Knight was deplored, a resolution of sympathy with the families being passed. Sympathy with the President in his bereavement and anxiety, and with members who have been laid aside by illness was also expressed.

The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, the first president, was re-elected to that office, especially as a mark of appreciation of his services in connection with the raising of the £50,000 for the Sustentation Fund. The Rev. Dendy Agate was re-elected treasurer, and the Rev. C. J. Street secretary, offices which they have held from the outset. The Revs. Charles Roper and H. McLachlan were elected to fill vacancies on the committee, and Mr. Arthur E. Piggott, F.S.A.A., and the Rev. E. W. Sealy were appointed as auditors. Representatives to the Ministerial Settlements Board, Committee on the Supply of Ministers, and Joint Committee for the Revision of the List of Ministers presented their reports, and were re-elected.

A discussion took place on the work of the Ministerial Settlements Board, and the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

"That it is desirable to discontinue sending to congregations a simple list of ministers willing to consider a fresh settlement."

"That if serviceable advice is to be given to congregations that ask for a recommendation, it is desirable that the Settlements Board should be able to forward the name of any minister who appears in the Year Book."

In support of the Sustentation Fund appeal an opportunity had been given to ministers to send in contributions through the Fellowship, apart from those which had already been sent in personally. Ninety-two ministers availed themselves of this, contributing £82 3s. It was reported that the total ministerial gifts to the new fund amounted to over £1,200.

The sum of £60 was transferred from General to Benevolent Fund account, and several grants were made, the balance being voted to the Committee to use at their discretion.

A discussion took place as to the respective provinces of the Advisory Committees and the Joint Committee for the Revision of the List of Ministers, the question having arisen in connection with the acceptance of lay workers as fully accredited ministers. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

"That it is desirable for the Advisory Committees to adopt a common line of action with regard to the issue of certificates to lay workers, especially in relation to their ministerial status."

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, the Joint Committee which represents the National Conference, British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and Ministerial Fellowship, is the final revising authority for the list of ministers."

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

AT the close of the public examination, on June 30, the numerous ministers and other friends who had assembled to celebrate the end of the College session had the pleasure of listening to some well-weighed reflections by the President of the College, Mr. R. D. Holt, M.P. He congratulated the Principal and Warden and the students on the results obtained from the year's work, and then urged that the supreme work of the ministry was the production of character. In a very telling illustration, drawn from the neglect to close the port holes of a ship in a recent catastrophe, he showed how much of the evil of the world resulted from the failure of a large number of people to do certain small things at a particular moment. If the ministry could keep the mass of men to simple, ordinary duty, it was doing an immense work. The meeting was then delightfully entertained and instructed by the wisdom of one of the Visitors of the College, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. "Making for Efficiency" was the title of an address full of shrewd comment on current phases of ministerial life and work, and of a bracing challenge to students to rise to the great opportunities and problems that lay before them. Quoting a recent American "Commission" on the subject to the effect that "the present supply of ministers was defective both in quality and quantity," Mr. Tarrant said it would be a good thing if they could ascertain the opinion of the people who were in the pews—or who ought to be there. For he remembered hearing Charles Dickens say that his faith in the people who governed the country was infinitesimal, but in the people who were governed, infinite. "Let us keep our eye on the man who will never be got to fill up a form." He then proceeded to review the various kinds of efficiency needed in a minister—physical, mental, and spiritual. As to the first, a minister must be able to "stand upright, breathe deeply, hear clearly, and see whether his congregation are asleep." It was often said that the colleges do not supply the right kind of mental food. Well, a perfect curriculum had not yet been put upon the academic market. In any case, the demand upon the modern minister covers an extraordinary range of subjects and mental interests, and one gathered that in our visitor's opinion there is no royal road, or other short cut, through this problem. One piece of advice, however, was that if we would be efficient we should seek contact with the men whose efficiency was a well-ascertained fact.

The valedictory service was conducted in the evening at Cross-street Chapel by the Rev. Henry Gow. Not only the outgoing students, but all present must have felt the impressiveness with which the preacher insisted upon the high seriousness of the subjects the newly-ordained ministers would have to deal with. It was a strong appeal for the reconsideration of the claims of religion upon the careful thought of the age. So many attempts have been made to render religion palatable and attractive that the world at large has an excuse for regarding it as something less than one of its greater concerns. There must be an insistence on the arduousness and imperativeness of the moral ideal if people are to be made to see that it is "worth while."

On Wednesday, July 1, a large number of friends of the College accepted the invitation to the beautiful grounds of Summer-ville, where a garden party was held.

The closing proceedings at the students' dinner on Thursday evening were presided over by the Rev. John Ellis, when a number of toasts were duly honoured, and speeches were delivered by Professor Alexander, of Manchester University, Mr. Monks, and Mr. E. Talbot.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

OXFORD SUMMER SESSION.

THE annual Session for Sunday School Teachers, in connection with the Sunday School Association, will be held at Oxford July 30 to August 8. The session has established itself as an institution ever since it was inaugurated in 1899. It remains as a delightful memory in the minds of those who have already been to Oxford, while of those who know it only by hearsay there are many who are longing for an opportunity of going. In order to bring it to the door of those who have to rely on general holidays, the Committee have altered the date, and it will be held this year at the Bank Holiday time. It is hoped that this step will be justified by a rush for membership, and certainly the applications to date are encouraging.

The programme this year is very representative both in choice of subject and in the widely varied opinions and origin of the lectures. Dr. Crooker, coming from America, will speak on the modern use of the Bible. The Rev. C. S. Bullock, from Canada, will give an account of a new method in children's services. The Rev. L. Tavener, from Scotland, will deal with a subject which he has made his own, namely Watts' pictures. From Ireland the Rev. E. Savell Hicks will come and give a lantern lecture on the Evolution of the Bible. Among subjects new to the session programme are "The Ways of Children," by Miss Tarrant, of Liverpool, and "Health and the Sunday School," by Dr. Jessel.

The Committee have also been fortunate in that the Rev. Carey Bonner, the Secretary of the Sunday School Union, and Miss Pelton, of Birmingham, have kindly consented to lecture. It is a sign of the freemasonry existing among all teachers and a happy result of the World's Convention at Zurich, where representatives from the Unitarian and other Associations were brought together into close touch. Among other lecturers are the Rev. A. Thornhill, Mr. Lewis Lloyd, the Rev. H. M. Livens, the Rev. A. W. Fox, and Mr. Chalmers, while the President, Mr. Ion Pritchard, with the Revs. J. A. Pearson, B. Lister, and H. Fisher Short, and Mr. W. B. Holmes, have agreed to open and to speak at various conferences of the teachers. The Sunday services will be conducted by the Rev. J. E. Odgers and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

It is indeed a happy augury for the success of the session that it should have for President Mr. Ion Pritchard, to whose personality so much of the success of these meetings is due. To him and to his sister, the late Miss Marian Pritchard, must be ascribed something that is even more valuable than the lectures, namely, the comradeship and the inspiring atmosphere of these gatherings, which sends every teacher home a convinced Sunday school enthusiast for life.

Dr. and Mrs. Carpenter, whose hospitality the teachers have enjoyed on previous occasions, have very kindly offered to entertain the members again. Dr. Carpenter will also conduct the opening service. There will be opportunities to explore Oxford and its river, which are sure to delight newcomers. The city has a personality. The setting is old, but the life is ever fresh, renewed perpetually every year. It is no more old than a child that borrows the faded dress of long ago from the chest in the attic and dresses up in it. Yet the history of the ages is marked by every style of building from the Saxon door in the Cathedral to the novel Forestry School, and we feel that there

The centuries must
Be visible corporate things,
And the high Past appear Affably real and near,
For all its grandiose airs, caught from the mien of Kings.

THE annual united service organised by the London District Unitarian Society will be held at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars (by the kind permission of the Rev. Baart de la Faille and his Consistory), on Sunday evening, October 18. The preacher will be the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, M.A., of Dublin.

THE Athenæum publishes to-day a special theological number in which many important and recent contributions to religious thought and scholarship are reviewed. The constant stream of books dealing with theology shows little sign of abatement, and the definite guidance which the Athenæum is so well qualified to give will be invaluable, especially to the earnest student with a keen intellectual appetite, and a modest purse which necessitates some prudence in satisfying it.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Coseley.—The 115th anniversary of the Sunday school in connection with the Old Meeting House was celebrated on Sunday last, July 5, when the Rev. H. C. Hawkins, of Oldbury, conducted the morning and evening services. In the afternoon a flower service was held, and a sermon preached by the Rev. J. A. Shaw, M.A., of Wolverhampton. Mr. Fred J. C. Poole (organist, Old Meeting House, Dudley) presided at the organ throughout the day, and gave a short recital before the evening service. The collections were considerably in advance of recent years, amounting to £17 14s. 9½d.

Ditchling.—On Sunday last the anniversary services were held at the Unitarian Church, when friends gathered from neighbouring churches, Billingshurst, Brighton, Horsham, Hastings, and Lewes being among those represented. The minister for the day was the Rev. H. Gow. During the afternoon some of the friends motored to Lewes to see the recent improvements which have been made at the chapel there.

Gateshead.—The anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, at Unity Church on June 28. On Monday, the 29th, the annual tea and public meeting were held, when addresses were given by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A. (Newcastle), Mr. H. V. Salmon (Sunderland), and others.

Leicester.—The Induction service for the Rev. Sidney Spencer, B.A., who has been appointed minister of the Free Christian Church, was held on Thursday, July 2, Principal Carpenter, the Revs. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, E. I. Fripp, and Kenneth H. Bond taking part in the service. In the evening the Mayor and Mayoress, Councillor and Mrs. J. Russell Frears, held a reception in the schoolroom. Mr. C. H. Roberts, on behalf of the congregation, offered the Rev. S. Spencer a very hearty welcome, which was supported by the Mayor, the Revs. — Phillips, Congregational minister, Desborough; F. S. Beddow, Wycliffe Congregational Church, Leicester; K. H. Bond, Chesterfield; W. C. Hall, Northampton; and E. I. Fripp. On Sunday, July 5, the Sunday school anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. S. Spencer. In the afternoon the Mayor gave an address to the young people.

Liberal Christian League.—A largely attended garden party of members and friends was held on Saturday afternoon, July 4, in the grounds of Inverkip, Woodford-road, kindly lent for the occasion by Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter. Addresses were delivered urging the claims of the Social Service section, and the necessity for hearty co-operation with the incoming president, Archdeacon Lilley, during his year of office.

London: Essex Church.—The committee have received, with very great regret, the resignation of the Rev. F. K. Freeston from the ministry of the church, on account of his ill-health, and of the change in the circumstances of the church owing to Mr. Speight's breakdown. The following resolution has been passed:—"That the committee hear with deep regret of Mr. Freeston's wish to resign the ministry of the church on account of his ill-health, and of the changed outlook of future arrangements for the church caused by the sudden termination of Mr. Speight's junior ministry. They wish to record, on behalf of the congregation, their sincere appreciation and gratitude for his long and faithful ministry of over 21 years, during which both he and Mrs. Freeston have done so much to promote the welfare and progress of the church. While regretfully accepting the resignation, they hope for the complete restoration of his health, and for the continuance of the friendly relations and intercourse which have so long existed with the members of the congregation." The resignation will take effect at Christmas.

London: Stepney Green.—Mr. W. R. Marshall writes from 31, Birkhall-road, Catford, S.E., on behalf of the scholars of College Chapel Sunday School, to appeal for some monetary help in order that the annual excursion may be held. "The school funds," he says, "have been seriously depleted by the effort to supply modern equipment on a reduced income, and there is a danger that the 'Treat' so anxiously anticipated by our Stepney young friends may be abandoned. Over and above the scholars' pence about £4 is needed to pay for a day in Epping Forest. Our secretary, Miss Read, 625, Forest-road, Walthamstow, or myself will gratefully acknowledge any contributions, however small."

Manchester.—Miss Kathleen Lambley has been awarded a "graduate scholarship" in the University of Manchester on the results of her examination in the Final School of French Language and Literature (first-class honours), and also the Ashburne travelling scholarship, and will proceed, in due course, to research work in the University of Paris.

Middleton.—The Sunday school anniversary services were held in Old-road Chapel on Sunday, July 5. In the morning Alderman W. G. Townend, J.P., conducted the service, and addressed the children. The minister of the chapel, Mr. Charles Smith, preached in the afternoon and evening. The total collections for the day amounted to over £16, that being an increase on the previous year of £4.

Sunderland.—The Sunday school anniversary and flower services were held on Sunday, July 5, conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Newcastle. A children's service was held in the afternoon, at which Mr. Wm. Stephenson gave an address. Mr. Stephenson has been appointed lay-missioner to the Sunderland church in place of Mr. H. V. Salmon, who is shortly leaving to enter college. Mr. Stephenson commences his duties in September.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE LAND QUESTION IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The memorandum submitted to Mr. Harcourt by a deputation which has been sent to England by the South African National Congress, praying that some assistance may be given by the Imperial Government in the direction of mitigating the effect of the Natives' Land Bill, will appeal to all fair-minded people. The Anti-Slavery Society has taken the matter up, and it is pointed out that not only did the Bill, which restricts the power of the natives to acquire land for themselves and reduces them to what is practically a state of servitude, meet with the disapproval of the Congress—an organisation for focussing native opinion—but religious conferences of South Africa, Anglican, Wesleyan, Congregational, Baptist, and Presbyterian, have passed resolutions against it. The Bill was hurriedly rushed through Parliament last year, and many hardships have already been endured as a result of its working. It forms, indeed, part of a gigantic scheme of segregation which will restrict the power of the natives more and more, but segregation they do not object to if they are allowed to own land in the selected areas, and if their rights are properly considered. What they protest against, naturally, is the dislike of Europeans in South Africa to the owning of land and cattle by the black man, because it makes him independent, and robs them of the power to use his abilities for their own money-making purposes.

THE LIMITATIONS OF DISCIPLINE.

Lord Roberts may be regarded as a typical militarist whose ideals and aims are alien to the true democrat as well as to the peace advocate, and his speech in the House of Lords on Monday night had reference to a controversial subject in regard to which it is very easy to be led astray. But his words on military discipline deserve to be quoted and remembered, for they were significant, and will undoubtedly be applied to other matters of which he was not thinking when he uttered them in the days to come. "Discipline," he said, "is an artificial bond, forged for the purpose of converting an unorganised collection of men into an organised body amenable to authority. It is in a sense a fetter which tends to gall the wearer, and to repress his individuality when first submitted to, but which gradually becomes a source of pride and satisfaction as he realises the necessity for it and the cumulative strength it affords. Discipline may be of such well-conceived strength, as is indeed the case with our Army, that it will dominate and override human nature under almost every imaginable circumstance, but it has inherent in itself the weakness of its artificiality, and it labours under this initial disadvantage when pitted against natural instincts. So much so is this the case that if you penetrate deep enough into the depths of human nature, you will unfailingly reach in each one of us a stratum which is impervious to discipline or any other influence from without. The strongest manifestation of this truth lies in what men call conscience—an innate sense of right and wrong, which neither reason nor man-made laws can affect." Here we come upon a higher form of discipline which is not "artificial," and which, at times, must claim obedience though all the forces of tyranny—military, social, industrial, or ecclesiastical—be against it.

FREE DISTRIBUTION OF "WAR AND PEACE."

In response to an appeal recently issued, it is announced in the current number of War and Peace that a fund has been established which will permit of the free distribution of copies of this excellent monthly to a select list of institutions. It is proposed, as an item in the propaganda of the movement for which it stands, to send copies of the paper to such centres as hotels, missions, trans-Atlantic liners, schools, libraries, university common rooms, working men's clubs, &c., places in which it will be intelligently read, and which it would not otherwise reach. During the course of a year there can be little doubt that by these means an entirely new public interest in the ideas that War and Peace is endeavouring to spread will be created. Those who wish to further this useful work should send donations to the Manager, War and Peace, Whitehall House, Whitehall, S.W., by whom they will be gratefully acknowledged. The July number devotes considerable attention to the subject of the capture of private property at sea, and is enlarged by the inclusion of a Literary Supplement, containing reviews of a number of books published during the last month which have a bearing, directly or indirectly, on what may be called "the Norman Angell point of view."

COMPULSORY SERVICE AND PHYSICAL TRAINING.

Mr. Charles Trevelyan, M.P., in his pamphlet on "Democracy and Compulsory Service," deals with one of the most popular arguments in favour of compulsory service, namely, that it will raise the physical standard of the population. The inferior physique of a large number of people in this country is an indisputable fact, but the War Office is not going to burden itself with the training of the weakling and the wastrel. They will only take the youths that are strong and healthy. "In Switzerland they discard 42 per cent. of the population for bad eyesight or disease. In Germany, before the latest increase in the army, only 53.4 per cent. of the men of military age were admitted as fit for service. Of the students from German universities, more than half are annually refused as below the standard. . . . Compulsory service will only train a little more those who are already the most fit. It will leave, as now, the great mass of the unfit to continue in their unfitness unless the State, in its civil capacity, undertakes to deal with them."

* * *
"If there is a national health campaign which is sensibly to affect the physique of the rising generation," continues Mr. Trevelyan, "it must be undertaken in a far larger spirit. All the youth ought to come within the scope of the training. It is even more important that the mothers of the race should be strong than the fathers. But because they are not wanted for fighting the girls are forgotten by the militarists. And among children of both sexes it is the weaker who require most and not least attention. In fact, the course of national training must have a medical basis. It must begin, as it is now beginning, in the elementary schools. It must be continued between fourteen and eighteen, a period when military training of a serious kind cannot be undertaken. It must not be merely drill. Indeed, the purely military exercises are of comparatively small value for general development. They are being discarded as irrelevant by informed and scientific opinion. All these things can be done by an educational system."

PURE MILK FOR THE CHILDREN.

At a meeting of the Parliamentary Committee on Food and Health, held at the House of Commons, and presided over by Mr. Charles Bathurst, M.P., the following resolution was moved by the Chairman, seconded by Sir W. Phipson Beale, M.P., and carried unanimously:—"The Parliamentary Committee on Food and Health cordially supports the Milk and Dairies Bill and Milk and Dairies (Scotland) Bill, as measures designed to secure to the community an unrestricted supply of pure milk, with the minimum amount of interference with the producer. While recognising them to be capable of improvement in some details, it earnestly deprecates the insistence on drastic amendments, as calculated gravely to imperil the passage of Bills long overdue, and of vital importance to the health of the people, and especially of the children. The Committee trusts, however, that a clause, sanctioning the sale of 'Certified Milk,' which in the United States has played so conspicuous a part in raising the milk standard, and in forming public opinion in favour of clean milk, will, by general consent and in the interests alike of producers and consumers, be included in both measures."

SOCIALISTS AT KESWICK.

The Fabian Summer School will hold its eighth session in the Lake District at Barrow House, near Keswick, from July 18 to September 12. A very interesting programme has been arranged, and the questions to be discussed include "Women in Industry," "Social Change in America," "The Nature and Value of Art," "Representative Government and Party Government," "The Co-operation of the Individual in the Future Socialism," "The Relation of the Church to the Socialist Movement," and "The Importance of Bergson's Philosophy for Socialist Thought." Among the speakers will be Mr. J. J. Mallon, Mr. S. K. Ratcliff, Dr. Haden Guest, Mr. A. Clutton Brock, Mr. F. W. Jowett, M.P., Miss Lilian M. Whitehouse, Miss Sophy Sanger, Mr. Emil Davies, and Professor Edith Morley. All the subjects of discussion mentioned above will be dealt with after August 1. The two weeks previous to that will be given up to a discussion by the Fabian Research Department of the various expedients for the Control of Industry, and the Working of Industrial Insurance, in which Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb, Mr. W. Mellor, Mr. C. D. H. Cole, and others will take part. Mr. Bernard Shaw and M. Emile Vandervelde, member of the Belgian Parliament, and leader of the Parti Ouvrier Belge, hope to be present.

A MOTHERS' REST HOME.

The Mothers' Rest Home at Hampstead Garden Suburb, in connection with the Garden Suburb Adult Schools, deserves advertisement and support, for it is doing a much-needed work on admirable lines. It is not, as the report for 1913-14 explains, a "charity" in the cold and conventional sense of the word, and the inmates of the homely little cottage (nursing mothers with their infants of a few weeks old) are treated as guests, and sent on their way when they leave cheered by the friendliness, comfort, good nourishment and sympathetic counsel which they have received. Three mothers can be offered hospitality at a time, and they are usually sent by London Adult Schools, sometimes by Schools for Mothers or churches, sometimes by doctors or others who are interested. They can stay for a couple of weeks, and there is no charge. Since the opening in May, 1912, over 60 have benefited by these advantages, and many more would have done so if they could have overcome the difficulty of finding someone to tend and care for their other children. Anyone who wishes to visit the Home may do so on week-days between 2.30 and 4.30 p.m., and friends willing to help are invited to consult the general secretary, Mrs. Irwin, 71, Erskine Hill, Hendon, N.W.

By an oversight the name of the book to which the article, "Among the Mountains of Sinai," in our columns last week referred, was omitted. It is "Sinai in Spring, or the Best Desert in the World," by M. J. Rendall (Dent & Sons).

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

NOTWITHSTANDING Factory Acts by the dozen, Education Acts, and an army of inspectors, the last official and Annual Report of Factories and Workshops reveals the existence of much hardship and positive cruelty in the employment of children and young persons of both sexes. At a large cotton mill in Lancashire workers from 13 to 16 were found lifting skiffs up to 82 lbs. In a bleaching works a girl of 15 had a pile of cloth on her back weighing 104 lbs. A boy of 13 certified to carry 14 lbs. was carrying buckets weighing 43 lbs. Brickmaking girls pushed barrows of brick weighing 425 lbs. The tale is told of laundry girls beginning work at three in the morning and employed all day on Sunday. The place was found in a little secluded hamlet. The mistress obtained young girls from charitable homes by advertisements in Church papers. No wonder an inspector writes of the effects of long hours in Lancashire :— "Bonny children lost their colour and their youthful energy in the hard drudgery of this daily toil. The girls would fall asleep at their work, and they grew worn and old before their time." The brutal cruelties described in this Blue Book are almost incredible, and ought to be quite impossible. The results are stunted bodies, premature old age, and embittered souls. We should like to know in how many cases employers were punished for callous treatment of the children in their employ, and to what extent the punishment was severe enough to be deterrent.

THE movement for the employment of women policemen is evidently making way, and shortly England will follow the example of Germany, Norway, Denmark, and many American and Canadian towns in appointing women to deal with various portions of police duty dealing with their own sex. For instance, how can public lodging houses for women, which must be open for inspection by the police night and day, be properly and decently visited by men? Again, there are many occasions when women would desire their depositions, often going into the most painful and delicate details, taken by women instead of the ordinary constable. Cases often arise in police courts requiring the sympathetic handling of a woman, and where a woman official could do ten times better than the most sympathetic man. And who so fitted to deal with the nightly and ghastly shame of many of our public streets as women? It is not a question of regulating the vehicular traffic of Piccadilly Circus, which the men manage with sufficient skill, but of dealing with the traffic in vice which goes on there almost unchecked.

"If by the aid of a radio-microscope I could examine the people in this hall, in 90 per cent. I should discover a small focus or area of tuberculosis." This startling statement was made by Sir William Osler at the annual meeting of the Society for the Prevention of Consumption, held in Leeds. And it need not be. Bad housing, dirt, insufficient food, dust-laden air, stuffy rooms, are accountable for this widely-spread disease. "When children enjoy the heritage of health to which they are entitled," continued Sir William, "when the workers have a living wage, when houses become homes, when the nation spends as much upon food as it now spends on drink, millions will become immune where at present there are only thousands."

* * *

At last a beginning is to be made in regard to the re-housing of the people. On behalf of the Government, Mr. Runciman, the Minister of Agriculture, has introduced a housing bill for agricultural districts and for workmen in Government employ where dwelling accommodation is not available. It is proposed to provide three millions for housing in rural districts. It is hardly likely that this Bill will be carried in the present session of Parliament and in view of the congested state of public business. It will, however, open the way for action in the next session. A more pressing social problem is not before us. The Bishop of London on the same day in Convocation declared that one of the great causes of the social evil dealt with in the Age of Consent Bill, introduced by him into the House of Lords, was due to overcrowding. The great mass of our population is crowded away in little rooms under conditions which make morality exceedingly difficult. And this is as true of many rural districts as of the great towns and cities.

MR. ROBSON'S striking article on "The Decline in Public Worship," which appeared in our columns, has moved a correspondent to add another to the causes enumerated by Mr. Robson as accounting for the remarkable falling off in church attendance during the last few years. Our correspondent writes:—"One of the most potent causes not noticed by Mr. Robson is the new liberty given to children as to how they shall spend their Sunday. 'The little dears! How cruel to force them to go to church when they want to play in the garden. I don't believe in making religion compulsory,' cries the fond mother. And she conjures up some dreadful picture of a Puritan Sunday with its gloom and restrictions, by which she appears to suggest she herself suffered in childhood, and declares that her children shall not be set against religion in that way. Well, sir, I came of a Puritan stock, was brought up in a Puritan atmosphere, had experience of the Puritan Sunday, and yet I bear witness to a happy childhood and to a host of happy Sundays. We had family prayers morning and evening, we went to Sunday school twice in the day and twice to church; we should no more have thought of not going to church on Sunday than of not having our breakfast on Sunday. It all came in quite simply and naturally and as a matter of course. It is true, church and Sunday school and family prayers were not as hilarious as a romping game of tennis; the services were long and often dull, the music would not satisfy a cathedral organist, the doctrine was atrocious, and yet we looked forward to Sunday with interest and always gave it a welcome. Certain Sundays spent each summer in the country come back to me in memory like the delicate scent of faded rose leaves—the walk across the cornfields to the little whitewashed chapel, the old-fashioned clerk with his pitchpipe, the old-fashioned tunes, the white-haired minister, the open windows through which came the rustle of poplar trees, the cooing of doves and 'the murmur of innumerable bees'—these things return upon us with a benediction. The doctrine again was atrocious, but it did me no harm, and at a very early age I began to throw it off. But I have never regretted the drill and discipline of that early religious experience. Nor can I understand the frame of mind which, while it insists on drill and discipline for mental training in childhood, thinks that drill and discipline are not needed for moral and spiritual training. Parents would not dream of allowing their children to stay away from school just whenever they pleased. Yet the moral faculties require just as careful and constant training as the mental."

So far our correspondent. In connection with this plea we refer our readers to that delightful book for the young, a book also full of wisdom for their elders, entitled "The Young People, by one of the Old People." It is not a bit Puritani-

cal. It treats of "The Play," "Books and Music," "Coming Out," "The Day's Work," "Sunday Out," and touches on the greater things of Faith and Hope with a wise tendency and a sympathy with the young which act like a spell on the reader. In the last chapter, "The Run of the Streets," the writer, speaking of his habit of taking the young people of his acquaintance to visit the renowned churches of London with their art treasures and historical associations, goes on: "But the pleasure of church-sightseeing ought to be founded on the habit of church-going. I believe that compulsory church-going is of great value for the education of children. Silence, discipline, reverence, humility, and self-judgment may be learned by them in church under more favourable conditions than are generally afforded in the school-room. Besides, it is a distinct advantage for them to attain these virtues in company. It is even probable that acts of conformity are of themselves good for children. They ought to be conventional before they venture to be original. Also, I doubt whether any sort of work or play exactly fills the hole that is made in a child's life when its parents rule church-going out of the curriculum. A child kept from church-going is to me like celery growing in the dark. Children ought to begin by feeling at home in church. Almost any kind of church will do sooner than let them play bridge all Sunday."

THE Representative Council of the Anglican Church has decided by a large majority that women may vote in the election of Church Councils and may also sit on parochial councils. This marks a considerable advance toward that equality of the sexes in all the relations of life which so many women are pushing forward. In all Churches it is faithful and earnest women on whom falls the chief burden of church work. In America it is the women and not the men who run the Churches. That is not a condition of things to be desired, but rather friendly and equal co-operation. In our Free Churches women have for many years now sat on their boards of management, and worked side by side with men in all Church affairs. The Anglican Communion has so far lagged behind, but the tendency of the times can no longer be resisted, although, strange to say, the greatest amount of opposition at the combined council of bishops, clergy and laity came from the laity. The figures of the division are not a little interesting. The constitution of the Council provides that no resolution shall be deemed to have passed unless it receives a majority assent of each of these three sections or estates.

The figures in the division were twenty-two bishops for the admission of women, three against; ninety clergy for, fifteen against; seventy-six laymen for, sixty-two against. One would have expected the bishops and clergy to be more conservative in such a matter than the laity. But bishops and clergy know, as laymen do not, the immense services rendered to the Church by women and their administrative capacity. We may yet live to see women in Anglican pulpits!

* * *

THE most interesting speech of an interesting debate was that of the Archbishop of York, who put it to the chivalry of the Council whether it was not true that women all over the country were more educated in the history and services of the Church than men. The difficulty was the number of Churchwomen, and he asked them whether it was a generous position to take up towards those who had borne a larger part of the work of the Church, to say that they admitted women's qualifications but were afraid of their numbers. It was a very democratic sentiment he gave utterance to at the close: "When he advocated the granting of the franchise to women, he was not thinking of young ladies of twenty-one, who played tennis and cultivated the society of the unbeneficed clergy, but of the hundreds and thousands of factory girls and mill girls in the East-end of London, in Yorkshire and in Lancashire, who were examples of what women as well as Christian women ought to be."

* * *

At the coming Church Congress, to be held in Birmingham, one evening is to be devoted to a discussion of "The Church of England and other Christian Societies." It is something to the good that the Church Congress should acknowledge the existence of "other Christian societies." Time was when the Church of England claimed to be the only Christian Church in our midst. But if it is desirable to discuss the relations of the Anglican Church to other Churches, would it not be wise and politic to invite representatives of those other Churches to explain their own position? So many Churchmen, so many of the clergy, have but the most imperfect acquaintance with Nonconformity in any of its aspects. It would be an interesting as well as an illuminating thing if Dr. Selby, Dr. Clifford, Dr. Rendell Harris, or Mr. Campbell were invited to tell the Congress something of the real history and the actual standpoint of these "other Christian societies," and why they remain outside the Established Church while wishing its religious work God speed!

SAINT OR SEER?

I.

Of course, it need not be either. It would seem possible to be just frankly contented, unambitious worldlings, leaving it to visionary or fantastical people to strive after an imaginary sainthood or seership; we may be this, yet also quite well-meaning and good-hearted citizens of a more or less civilised community; men and women who take the obvious, external, everyday world for what it is worth, at its face value, and concern themselves about nothing higher or deeper or beyond; busy, industrious, virtuous folk, for whom the significance of life lies in its work and its recreations, its eating and drinking, its getting and spending, its material possessions, its pleasures of the senses, its conventional duties, its social respectabilities, its passing shows, its fleeting pleasures and pains, triumphs and disasters, hopes and fears. To say that a man is a worldling is not to judge him a bad man; it is only to say that he is but indifferently developed, that the finer human qualities are only latent in him as yet. He is simply one of those who take life for what it stands for in externalities of comfort and bodily satisfaction; who are concerned with what they would call their "duty," and work at it steadily, though with an eye to their own advantage and reputation in the world, who have small patience with dreamers and revolutionaries, to whom material things are real and spiritual things fanciful and unreal. It is probable there is something of this sort of worldling in nearly all of us; and the main body of the vast human host, dwelling on this habitable earth, is still pretty much at that stage of "creative evolution."

But there is something, too, in nearly all of us which, at times, disturbs the contentment of this rather profitless, unascending ideal of life. Hardly anybody finds the satisfactions, on these lower levels, quite sufficing always. The most favoured of conventionally virtuous worldlings are not happy every day, nor do they sleep composedly every night. The urge of aspiration, the longing to be and to achieve on some other line of advance, stirs and troubles them in certain moods and under certain conditions and happenings of experience.

I will resist the temptation to speculate on the cause or source of this disturbing impulse. It is not difficult to resist that temptation, because it is no longer, for me, very strong. A certain passing interest attaches to the discussion of the origin of those mysterious impellings or persuadings from within, which, from the dawn of civilisation and beyond, have harassed and inspired the soul-consciousness of living beings. But the discussion never amounts to much or carries us very far. The impulse is there, and emerges from the depths of life, from the "hiding places of man's power," whereof we know so little. Yet it is significant to note that not only philosophers, but physical scientists are now speaking of this "Urge or Impetus of Evolution" as a living, conscious reality. "Why this extraordinary insurgence," asks Professor ARTHUR THOMSON, "this climbing of precipitous heights? Why the big lifts in evolution? . . . What is the nature of this vital impulse towards a higher and higher efficiency, something which ever seeks to transcend itself? Negatively, it is something that cannot be expressed in the abstractions used in formulating physical events. Positively, it partakes of the nature of consciousness."*

But what remains of supreme interest and significance for us is that, in the mind of man, this urge or impetus to higher things, this "climbing instinct," becomes a call and a persuasion to seek those higher things and to win them by deliberate effort. We choose to climb; we like the steep ascent, and foot it of our own good will. And to some this call transcends everything else, gives to life its supreme interest, takes the form of a divine command, becomes an impassioned and imperishable ideal. Thus far, in the advance of the race, these climbing enthusiasts have been, perhaps, comparatively few. "Many are called but few are chosen," the prophet of Nazareth said in one of his sorrowful moods. And long before him Plato had written, "Many are the thyrsus-bearers but few are the divine mystics"—meaning, perhaps, the true aspirants. But there are always some of these; and probably their number increases from age to age; and there may be more enthusiasts for that something beyond worldly comfort and content, which has been the dream of prophets and reformers, of thinkers and poets, of saints and seers, in the long history of our race—there may be more to-day than in any former age. I suspect there are.

Now it is of interest to note that those over whom this call to something other than virtuous worldly content gains strong and persistent control are led to shape their course in one of two directions; towards a withdrawing from the world, a forsaking of its ordinary pursuits, or towards a closer contact with it and so to a keener perception of its reality. When any ardent soul, becoming aware of the unsufficingness of mere buying and selling, gaining and losing—of the dull, prosaic, philistine existence—yields to the impulse to live for what he calls "things of the spirit," he may be seized with the desire to get out of it all, to become a recluse, to adopt in some one of its many forms the monastic way of life. The extreme form of this passionate forsaking of the world finds its ideal expression in literature in SHELLEY's "Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude"; EMERSON's "Good-bye, Proud World" gives voice to it in some of the loveliest lines he ever wrote. The hermits of Oriental races, the various monastic institutions of the Middle Ages and of later times, are the practical (or unpractical) illustrations of the same spirit. And I venture to suggest that the attempts of many enthusiasts of recent years to establish independent and separate communities, communistic or otherwise, which aim to have no dealings with the bustling business world of competitive strivings and commercial or political rivalries, are also a form of the same tendency. All these are efforts to come out of the world, to get clear of its low ambitions, to live above it, to dispense with it, perhaps even to despise it, till it comes round to their ideals and aims.

I should like, for the moment, to exploit the word "Sainthood" for this form of enthusiasm—to give the name of saints to all these would-be forsakers of the world. It may be a somewhat arbitrary application of the term, but it will serve my purpose happily, without, I hope, offending any sensitive mind. For, indeed, the word does, usually, stand for a life or character that is set apart, that is thought of as pure and holy by reason of withdrawal from that which contaminates or defiles, as the every-day world is supposed to do. It is, of course, also used of that rare human achievement—a life that threads its way among the gross or refined immoralities of modern society, full of sympathy and tenderness, yet stainless and undefiled, or with hardly a sign to show that thought or act of its own has soiled its robes. This, too, for us to-day, would mean sainthood, should we chance to come upon it in human form. But let the word now stand for the kind of aspiration which seeks to conquer worldliness by other-worldliness, to get above the world and its follies by getting out of it, or by pessimistic despair of it—which hopes to escape the hell of the world's iniquities by finding or creating a heaven which excludes them or (when they creep in) deports them, without trial, to the old country that bred them! For the moment, then, let the word "saint" stand for the monk or nun, or hermit or recluse, of any and every sort—religious, ethical, social, political; it might even include the so-called "Higher Thought" philosophers and healers, of a certain type, who live and move in the attenuated atmosphere of psychic elevation or seclusion.

But there is another way of response to the appeal which the "urge or impetus of evolution" makes, when it masters us from within, and we resolve to get above the worldling who is our neighbour, or just our own meaner self. We may achieve this, not by despising the world and running away from it, but by coming to closer grip with it and seeing further into the reality which abides within or behind it. It is possible to look through the outward show and visible appearance of things and to discern a spirit or vital purpose working there. And as we do this, and strive to enter into fellowship with that inner spirit or purpose, we become aware of something that answers to the best and noblest instincts of our own mind. In those moods of insight and contemplation, when we seem to touch or feel the very soul of the world communing with our own, a sense of kinship is made real to us; the spirit of nature or of humanity, or of both in one, reveals itself to the unworldly spirit in ourselves; and in that hour we know, in the deepest and most vital sense in which knowledge is possible to us. It is not very much a matter of thought or reasoning; indeed, the ordinary processes of thinking, by intellectual concepts and logical sequence, are mostly laid aside in such moods; we seem to surrender to the great Life of things; we lie open to the inflowings of mysterious power; we let the "Over-Soul," as EMERSON called it, prevail within us and pour its light into our minds, its impulse of vast feeling into our hearts. And then we see, and what we see then is truth—the full truth for us, so far as, at that stage, we are able to receive it.

The classic passage from English literature, describing the experience to which I refer, is in WORDSWORTH's Tintern Abbey poem—the lines which tell of

That blessed mood,
In which the burthen and the mystery,
In which the weary and the heavy weight
Of all this unintelligible world
Is lightened—that serene and blessed mood,
In which the affections gently lead us on,

While with an eye made quiet by the power
Of harmony, and the deep power of joy,
We see into the life of things.

"We see into the life of things"; and the life thus seen is not something to run away from or despise, in order to become what the nobler self demands. The reality we discern there, in the forms and operations of nature, in the strivings and conflicts of humanity, is still beyond our understanding; aspects of terror, as well as of beauty, confront us; the mystery and the immensity of it all may overwhelm us at times. But it allures and invites; it claims us for its own; Nature, at her wildest as well as at her sweetest; Mankind, when ruthless and seemingly self-destructive, as well as when gracious and affluent of love—both retain our fellowship and hold us to their hearts when we have seen and felt the fascination of their real life. For, of course, we belong to them; we are a part of their mysterious being; we share in the age-long movement whereof history and science, philosophy and religion keep such wondrous and appalling records. We cannot turn away; we love this surging and tempestuous order of things, this wayward, wicked, holy, suffering, rejoicing, inevitable world; we are bone of its bone, flesh of its flesh, soul of its soul. And when we see this, we know that our own sufficing, our own perfecting, the fulfilment of our highest ideals of good, is one with that slow mysterious process by which knowledge and beauty, wisdom and goodwill come to their own in the hearts and lives of conscious beings like ourselves.

So, then, I wish to claim for Seership a higher place than Saintliness, in the sense in which I ask to be allowed to use the words for my present purpose. The saints, who have tried to escape the world by withdrawing from its strife and turmoil, have not played much helpful part in the evolution of human holiness or social happiness and health. There have been times, such as in the Europe of the Middle Ages, or France of the seventeenth century, when aspiring souls could do no other than flee into monasteries, or like the Port-Royalists bury their splendid talents in the silence of lonely cells. But though something has been achieved thus by a few strenuous souls, whose names and writings have still their charm for us in meditative moods, in the main they were futile efforts, and failed to check or to change for good the real life of humanity. But the seers who have "seen into the life of things" and loved that life without being submerged by its illusions, or blinded by its outward shows, these have saved their own and others' souls by throwing in their lot with the lowliest and finding their joy in the fellowship of the least and the worst, and so have helped to redeem the soul of society itself. The saint may be likened to SHELLEY's skylark, "Thou scorner of the ground!" but the seer is like WORDSWORTH's, who can "While wings aspire" keep "heart and eye"

Both with the nest upon the dewy ground.

Type of the wise who soar, but never roam,
True to the kindred points of heaven and home.

In a second article I will offer a homely illustration of my theme, and endeavour to indicate those qualities of mind and heart which would seem to be essential to Seership, or most contributory to its attainment in human experience.

W. J. JUPP.

A NEW TYPE OF CHRISTIAN.

WE witness in our day the emergence of a new type of Christian of whose peculiar psychology the average Rationalistic, and even Theistic, critic does not take at all adequate account. The type is not new in the sense of coming up to, far less of surpassing, such historic types as Juliana or A Kempis, but new only as being peculiarly fitted for giving a reason for the faith that is in it, especially when confronted by the most up-to-date arguments of the Rationalistic school. I refer to such a type generally as the devout Modernist in the Roman Catholic Church, of whom the late Father Tyrrell could be taken as the best representative in this country, or, perhaps better for my purpose here, to such a type as Dr. Fr. W. Foerster, a Christian unattached to any of the historic Churches, of whom some account has recently been given in these columns. Foerster is a man of out-and-out rationalistic, naturalistic, humanistic and ethical upbringing and nurture. He is an intimate in the very world of his Rationalistic critics, knowing its every nook and cranny and corner. He is an adept in the use of every weapon of its armoury. Yet, somehow or other, by a process not altogether unanalogous to the transformation—or shall we say transfiguration?—of the chrysalis into the butterfly, he has emerged into a world of supra-rationalism, supra-naturalism, supra-humanism, supra-ethicism—into the world, in short, of Christianity.

Now it is folly, and it is to court disaster, for the Rationalistic, or even Theistic, critic to attempt to relegate this type of Christian to the back-wash of the tides of progress. This man is not one of your ordinary babes in Christ at all! For he possesses not only the divine secrets that are not infrequently revealed to babes and are hidden from the prudent, but he has also the worldly wisdom of the schools, and can cope with his adversaries on their own terms. He has only got above, or beyond, Rationalism, or Naturalism, in the sense that Rationalism or Naturalism is an experience he has outgrown. He is still a Rationalist, but how much more than a Rationalist! And, unlike the butterfly, he can revert to the chrysalis stage at will, and out-chrysalis the chrysalis. It is true that he has emerged into a new world whose categories are wholly different from those of the schools. But he can, if needs be, restrict himself within these academic categories—for he has passed that way before.

Thus, in his "Marriage and the Sex Problem" (the English translation of his "Sexualethik und Sexualpädagogik," Wells Gardner, London, 1912), writing as a psychologist, sociologist and educator, and not as a Christian (he has become a Christian as the result of being a psychologist, sociologist and educator!), Foerster arrives at convictions in regard to the sex problem which coincide with the principles of the historic Christian Church, and not with those of modern exponents of a "new morality," such as Ellen Key and Edward Carpenter. And "is it," he asks, "in accordance with the spirit of free inquiry to reject a genuine scientific opinion because it happens to be in agreement with the standpoint of the historic Christian Church?" It is impossible in a brief article to summarise the arguments brought forward by Foerster in a volume of some 250 pages. I can only refer readers to the text itself, and affirm that, throughout, Foerster challenges his critics to confront him solely as psychologist, sociologist and educator and not as Christian with the whole paraphernalia of bigotries which any mention of that word often calls up in their minds.

As regards one question which has exercised the minds of readers of THE INQUIRER, Foerster speaks with no uncertain voice. The late Father Tyrrell writes somewhere in his autobiography that "the question of the relation of Christianity to other religions is just the whole question." Foerster has arrived at conclusions in regard to this crucial and fundamental question which are striking in the unmistakableness of their conviction, especially when we bear in mind that they have been reached apart altogether from the influence of any religious training or atmosphere, out of the depths of his own psychology, and in the midst of a thoroughly rationalistic and ethical environment. He has become convinced, in short, that the Christian religion is the sole foundation for both individual and social life—that "once let men turn with sufficient earnestness to the central and inner problems of our existence, . . . Christianity will stand forth as the only true foundation of our whole life and civilisation." This is not even apologetic. It is faith, it is conviction—but it is also intellect. Again he writes:—

"Our modern educators are no more than beginners in the great problem of the care of souls and the development of conscience, and they would have done well to have learnt in this difficult sphere from the great spiritual and psychological knowledge and pedagogical experience of the Church, instead of attempting to base themselves solely upon their own ideas and upon their own fragmentary experience."

In the light of all this a recent prophecy by a contributor to these columns that "the time is rapidly coming, if not come, when its (Christianity's) claim to finality will be recognised as a perfectly natural piece of spiritual arrogance" could only have been made in ignorance of such a contribution as this of Foerster's, and of such ways of approaching this question as are evidenced in Mr. Whitaker's powerful tractate, "The Finality of the Christian Religion," and in the no less powerful leading article, "Beyond Progress," in this journal of the 21st ult.

But even the very latest brand of Christian, spite of all his scientific armoury, may prove suspect! And under these circumstances it is encouraging to discover an almost equally effective protagonist in the enemy's own camp. Bergson assails the arrogance of the intellect with the complete artillery of the intellect, and emerges into a world of supra-intellect. I do not, however, refer here to his epoch-making contribution to what one might almost term thought beyond thought, but to a recent contribution of a brilliant young philosopher of Montpellier, Professor Jean Delvolvé, in his book, "Rationalisme et Tradition: Recherches des conditions d'efficacité d'une morale laïque." (Félix Alcan, Paris, 1910), who, writing as a Rationalist to the rationalistic educators of France, subjects both the traditional Catholic education and the lay moral education in France to a penetrating psychological analysis, and has almost succeeded in demonstrating even to Rationalists—has at least gravely perturbed them—that the traditional Christian educational psychology does prove effective for moral ends, whereas the current rationalist educational psychology does not. M. Delvolvé arrives at the startling conclusion, while keeping strictly to a naturalistic basis throughout, that the rationalist educator must, if he would prove effective, discover that something effectual which the traditional Christian education has managed to preserve, but which the secular rationalistic education has let slip through its fingers. He holds that the traditional education does frequently bring about an utter self-surrender to universal claims by means of its doctrines of God and Christ and the immortal life, its cult and worship and sacraments, and that the lay moral education, in order to become effective, must incorporate in itself what is proven to be psychologically efficacious in the traditional doctrine, while it nevertheless abdicates nothing of the rights of reason and of the spirit of science and of liberty. What he thinks is now required is a naturalistic transposition of Christian values into forms which will prove reasonably acceptable to the modern mind, and in accordance with the terms of modern science. I cannot summarise his arguments in this place—I have done so in the "International Journal of Ethics" for January, 1912.

The writer does not, as does Foerster, emerge into supra-naturalism, but he comes very near to this, and it is my conviction that, steeped as he is in the Christian psychology, if he resolutely pursues his psychological explorations he will be forced to the conclusion, as a mere matter of logical necessity, that historical Christianity does provide us, as nothing else can or does, with "something beyond this fleeting temporal order—a heavenly standard of values." And I am no less convinced that science itself will increasingly aid us in taking up our stand resolutely not only for the supremacy but for the finality of the Christian religion. There only can we find a stay in an anarchic world. There only can we find a faith which shall yet overcome the world. And even the Goddess of Reason will be on our side if we are to judge by the contributions with which she has already supplied us.

H. H. JOHNSON.

HOW LANTY LIVES.

"THAT'S a fine day, Lanty!" said the Master, greeting the Man.

"It is, indeed, sir! As fine a day as ever came out of the heavens. Glory be to God!" replied Lanty, with the habitual piety of the Irish peasant.

The Master was looking down upon the Man from the brink of a deep dyke, at the bottom of which Lanty was fashioning a drinking-place for the Master's cattle. Lanty was barefoot, and stood ankle-deep in mud and water. His shapeless brogues, his ragged socks lay on the bank as he had kicked them off; a sordid, pathetic blot upon the fresh, exquisite spring verdure beneath them.

It suddenly struck the Master that Lanty must be taking the beauty of it all pretty well upon trust. From where he stood, wielding a skilful shovel among the slime and water-weeds, nothing could be seen of the flowery grass, the young adornment of the trees with their half-opened foliage, the hawthorn hedgerows, fragrant and beautiful. An ideal working-place, where the sun shone and sweet airs blew! Fancy a factory, now, or a mine! But . . . what if Lanty was always down too far?

The Master was sub-consciously aware of Lanty's probable point of view, for he was troubled by some imagination and much power of sympathy. Also he himself had had personal experience of wrestling a living from Nature, out away on a lonely farm in one of the Western States. He therefore knows that farm work, even on your own land, may pall. Doubly tedious must it be, when, whatever the result of your labour, it affects the Master only. You just draw your wages. Whether you "mitch" or put your back into it, it's all the same. This makes you stale.

To counteract this, if possible, the Master talks to the Man, passes on the daily paper to the Man, and has now given this job of constructing the water-hole to him. We all are fascinated by a play with water. And the Master knows Lanty to be a clever fellow, with a considering, inventive faculty, the which, when you possess, it is a pleasure to exercise. Lanty would have made a tip-top engineer.

Now, smiling, fickle May sent a blast abroad, keen and strong. It whistled along the dyke, and filled the Master's soul with remorse as he remembered Lanty's rheumatism.

"There's not much fun down there, Lanty!" he said.

"Troth, sir, there's not much fun in any of it!" quoth the Man, with the strange stoical cheerfulness of his class. The Master felt a qualm.

"But you should be used to it all by now!"

"Ay ought I! if ever anyone was! But does that make it any better? To start at the black labour, when you're no more nor the hoith of a bee's knee, weeding turnips till the fingers ud be dropping off of you with the cold and wet; then by degrees able to lead a horse; then ploughing, hay-making, harvest. I remember to be very proud when I hired at the farmer Murphy's beyant there for six shillings a-week and my food—and I with a houseful of children and a shilling a-week rent to pay. Only for the Woman (wife) I happened on . . . but she's gone, God rest her soul! Died on the twelfth babby—I often wonder how she kept their eyes open at all."

The Master remembered that epoch, and how it had been said that Almighty God must have some little way of His own, unnonst-lek (unknown) for keeping the full spoon with a long weak family like Lanty's.

"But things are better now! Wages are higher, and your boys earning—and your plot of land. . ."

"Ay!" said the Man, without, however, the enthusiasm that might have been expected, "there's the plot—grows potatoes and wheat—it's worth something. But you have to work middling hard to get a crop out of it! and you'll not feel so very anxious to go dig and plant there at night, and you after putting a day's labour over you! But there's where it is! You do get sick and tired. Go out in the morning, to work; come home at night, too bet-up almost to eat your supper, only wanting to get your head down on the bed, the way you'll be fit to work again the next day. But, sure, a body must take what God sends!" As Lanty spoke he was leaning on his shovel, an attitude he often adopts. Truth to tell, he does not kill himself by working too hard! Leniently the Master observed the Man, admiring, not without a shade of envy, his lithe, well-proportioned figure, preserved to middle age by spare diet and steady work. With what easy grace does the Man swing pitch-fork or axe!

"He'd knock spots off any of us, if he had the chance, at tennis or golf!" muses the Master, who is growing a bit short in the wind, and stout.

But he is fond of a game still; Lanty mows and rolls the courts for him. He hunts; Lanty stops the earths, and may get a stray shilling for opening gates. When the hounds meet anywhere handy, cart-ropes wouldn't keep the Man at his work. You'll see him and his kind following the hunt for hours. The huntsmen, the horses, and the hounds make a brave pageant in the grey lives of country workers.

"It's getting late, Lanty!" says the Master.

"Sure isn't it doing that since breakfast!" says the Man, with a laugh.

"There's the Angelus. . ."

The Man takes off his hat as the sweet, solemn bell sounds forth its call; his lips move in prayer. I think the Master joins him, though the bald ritual of his Church does not enjoin this simple devotion.

Master and Man stroll away together through the quiet evening fields.

"You'll be having early beef there, sir!" says the Man, as they pass through the sleek cattle, unfretted "maw-crammed beasts."

The Master nods silently.

Beef, yes! but not for Lanty. Pleasure, beauty; but his work lies so that he doesn't see it. Not much fun in any of it, is there, for Lanty?

But what is to be done?

K. F. PURDON.

BOOKS OF LIFE.

AMONGST the many ideas—"good stunts," in her vernacular—imported by an American student fresh from college and adventurous travel in the Wild West, was that of a somewhat arbitrary selection of "Books of Life." It professed to be a choice of those that Saw Life steadily, and saw it whole, and it chiefly consisted of the great poets, though Marcus Aurelius and Thomas à Kempis were included. The test was vitality, and it was required that the principles should be capable of direct translation into the actions and conduct of everyday life.

There is something pathetic yet hopeful in this classification of the world's greatest books. The idea appeared in England several years ago in Sir John Lubbock's list of the "Hundred Best Books," and still continues in cheap library sets, and the countless new popular editions of oddly assorted standard works. An ideal library is not formed in this way, but should be, as it were, an expression of the development of the personality, a gradual accumulation of hard-won volumes that are regarded as friends by their owner. But these selections are a recognition of the value of literature, and of the high truth that the end of reading is not the mere acquisition of knowledge, but the attainment of wisdom and understanding.

All great literature is representative of life in the widest sense—that of the universe as well as the individual—but the "Books of Life" are those that present the deepest, clearest, and simplest symbols. But personal needs must be different, and the American student's own list—chosen from the publisher's selection—would have failed to satisfy any other in our circle of friends. One student cared for little besides the Bible, Plato, and Browning. Another, a nature-mystic, pinned her faith to Emerson, Carlyle, and Wordsworth. Even the same mind may outgrow its first loves, and find new symbols as it grasps fresh ideas, lifts the veil of a new language, and discovers another literature or develops stronger and wider sympathies. It was a surprise and disappointment to find that the American student thought little of Wordsworth and less of Emerson, and, singularly enough, never mentioned the supposed representative poet of young America, Walt Whitman. This was probably due to idiosyncrasy, for although she quoted with rapture the "most musical, most melancholy," quatrains of Omar Khayyam, who had an honoured place amongst her "Books of Life," they shared her inconsistent affections with essays by smart and epigrammatic modern journalists who extol action as the true aim of life.

But action is little more than a dream to many fettered souls—the inner life is their reality, being and knowing their vocation. Many poets have been of this order, and the saints—what are their records but pœans of triumph, as they "led captivity captive" by the transcendence of limitation? Life appears to such souls as a process, a becoming, a progress through faith and hope and love, towards a final consummation which is the true self-realisation. For them, also, in their degree, life is a pilgrimage, a journey, an ascent towards a vision of the supernal Light that shines through the painted veil of appearances. And it is the saints and poets, not the scientists and philosophers, who seem to know whither they go and the way; and their institutions are usually of greater practical value to us than treatises on metaphysics, or the discoveries of the scientists.

Undoubtedly the greatest teachers of the meaning and purpose of life have been Eastern by birth or sympathy. But Oriental ideas and methods generally seem strange and difficult to Western minds, which refuse to believe that the tangible things of the world are maya, illusion, and that the intangible experiences of the inner life are nearer to the true reality. The Western mind must still be taught by symbols—a Church, a Book, a Sacrament, a code of Ethics, or the love of Humanity. Something definite to be believed, something practical to be done—these are essential to the Western, and activism is a characteristic development of the most religious modern philosophy. Upon this foundation of practical ethics and social reform, a spiritual temple such as the world has never yet seen may arise in the future. For, as Platonists and mystics have always insisted, the "active virtues" are the basis of the higher life, and where this is weak the superstructure may be beautiful, but it will never be safe. Therefore, those who would teach the West to take its share in the building of the Temple of Life, do well to demand the practice of the social virtues, and the translation of principles into action, though this may seem to retard spiritual progress. Hence the Books of Life for the modern world are not the Upanishads of India, or the Hermetic teachings of Egypt and Greece, wonderful and enlightening as these writings are for the mystics of all time. It is life in action, in symbol and sacrament, that the modern mind understands, or desires to experience in order that it may learn wisdom. It seeks its philosophy in the novel, the drama, or in history and biography. It cares little or nothing for abstract reasoning; it demands life in form, expressing itself in action—concrete humanity, in the individual or the community. It is the spirit of the Renaissance—and may be the herald of the birth of a new consciousness, and a fuller life for all.

And what are the books that may become the teachers and the guides of this generation—truly such an age as that foreseen by the prophet, when "many shall run to and fro and knowledge shall be increased"? The list must be as eclectic as that of the American student, for the only vital books are those that make a personal appeal to the individual. But it is safe to say that Browning is still the great poet-teacher of the century, for however the popularity of his longer and more "obscure" poems may vary, "Paracelsus" stands alone as the great symbol of the poet-soul facing the mystery of life's purpose and the way to fulfil it. "Rabbi ben Ezra" is unapproachable as a justification of life's discipline from the religious point of view. "Abt Vogler" and other Art and Music poems give the artist's standpoint, and "Christina" and many other love-poems fill up all that is wanting in the philosophy of this truly universal poet. Truth, Beauty, Goodness, and Love the Unifier—all these aspects of Life are seen by him in a stronger light than by any other poet of his time. There is much valuable teaching in Tennyson's "Ancient Sage," but it is essentially a mystical poem and would not appeal to all. Swinburne's chorus from Atalanta is a glorious piece of music, an inspiring song of enchantment, and a vision of humanity before which all that is small and mean seems to fade and vanish away. But these are poems for idealists only. Robert Louis Stevenson's verses and essays are of a different calibre. They belong to the world of effort and achievement, of stoicism, rather than optimism, but their message is one of encouragement and uplifting.

Joy to endure and be withstood—
Lord, is not that enough?

Probably the "Books of Life" for the eager souls of this generation are still Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" and Edward Carpenter's "Towards Democracy." It is easy to criticise their formlessness, their lack of precision in ethics and economics, and their confusion of principles with an emotion that sometimes verges on sentimentalism. But they are books of life as it is and may be, books of brotherhood, of justice and mercy to man and beast, of faith and of hope for the world. Nothing daunts these optimists—neither sin, ugliness, pain, disease nor death. They know that life is holy and good and beautiful in itself, however the form may change or decay. For them as for the Hebrew prophet, "God is in His holy Temple" of the Universe—and whether the earth keep silence before Him, or whether it "sing a new song" of His glory, it is done in "all reverence for the Divine Life. Uncouth, over-zealous, and a little barbaric, the modern cultured world may judge these poets, especially the pioneer and breaker of traditions. But the sense of conflict in the poems is of itself a proof of their ethical ideal and spiritual value. It is no superficial Pantheistic content with things as they are, and a world in which there is no real difference between good and evil. It is rather a joyful acceptance of a strenuous conflict through which new power may be gained by defeat and victory alike, since it is an age-long test in which the combatants are engaged, and no one event can decide the issue. Because the purpose of evil is the strengthening of good, these daring prophets hail it as the servant of Righteousness. This teaching is, like Goethe's, strong meat for babes, but it is not poison, and just as Goethe nourished Byron, Carlyle, and the greater Victorians, so the poetry of Walt Whitman and Edward Carpenter may be the intellectual food of the giants of the future. At least they have faced the sternest facts of life, and striven to see it whole—not steadily, perhaps, but in the sudden gleams and dazzling visions of a glory to be revealed. "Vistas"—that favourite word of Walt Whitman—expresses the character of these strange and seemingly formless poems of the present and the future. They range from the dust to the star, and glimpse eternity—they are books of eternal life.

THE LIVING WATERS.

THOU, God, livest thy divine life within the channels of our earthly needs.

Thou pourest thyself upon the world through us; thou sendest us forth as streams of the living love, as workers of the works of God, as discoverers and explorers of the world, as an endless stream of living souls and loving lives, pouring thoughts of truth, goodness, toil and industry forth upon the world around.

Now will we go forth to life on earth anew; we will rush forth from the well-spring of God; we will carry thy spirit, thy purposes, thy joys and thy sorrows forth into the world.

Now will we thank thee afresh for the feet thou givest us, that we may run upon the errands of mercy and compassion, that we may walk in the paths of goodness and truth, that we may move about in the world and be active and energetic upon the earth; that we may run and not be weary in the service of God, and walk gladly in thy ways and not faint.

Now will we open our eyes to the glory of the flowers and the fruits, and gaze in wonder upon the infinite variety and beauty of the world around us.

Now will we scent once more the sweet perfumes of the fruits, and fragrances that make so swift a response around us to that knowledge of God and of his goodness which ever wells up afresh within. We will feel the sweet response of meadows, gardens, and orchards in the world without, responding to the scent of the living waters in the soul within.

Now will we listen to the songs that all the birds are singing when day dawns over the hills, and when evening sets across the sea; when the songs and the singing of the world around us re-echo the songs and the singing in the heart like singing streams of gladness, like slow, sad music of sorrowfulness; like tragic choruses of the divine anger and chastisement for our sins; like sweet, soft melodies of mercies that endure for ever—the divine music within, the harmony of the music of God, our reconciliation with him.

Now, therefore, we behold both the land and the sea, and the ships upon the sea, and the men upon the ships, that, like children, sail them on the wondrous deep. And the cities of men upon the seashore—and the anxiety—and the business—and the care. And we behold each man in the outer stream of the outer world, and lo! upon his careworn face is the mark of the soul, of the concern how to live rightly; the sense of sadness and sorrow, and of the rebuke of God, and of the just and honest judgment of heaven on every wrong.

And lo, our hands and our feet! To move about among these anxious men and women and to work God's will; to work righteousness and truth, honesty and justice; to help and strengthen our neighbours; to heal the sick, give strength to the weak, relieve the oppressed, with divine sympathy; to render heavenly aid; to minister to the needs of the souls that toil on earth in all their tragedies, their agonies, their sorrows and their difficulties; to be friends, to be neighbours, to be lovers and helpers one of another—here is our work for God.

THE DECLINE IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

SIR,—No truer word can be expressed on this subject than that contained in the latter portion of Mr. Joseph Wilson's article in your current issue.

When he says, "Our services must meet and satisfy the yearnings of the soul. . . . What men need is what men have always needed—spiritual power for service in the everyday life," and "The demand of the church must be for absolute surrender to the will of God," he has touched the very core of the matter. The churches fail, partly because they play too cheap a game, and they do this in order to get the wherewithal to carry on their existence. The whole tendency of the age, and the organisation of society, commercially and industrially, is such as to bring organised religion into disrepute among thinking men; they see the utter discrepancy between the teaching of Jesus and the heartless cut-throat competition of present-day business, and the policy of selfishness which dominates the dealings of man with man, both individually and nationally, and they decide, either to worship God in their own way, without the aid—and expense—of churches, or not to trouble about him at all. In the former course who can blame them? In the latter they are entirely wrong. And the church authorities try one means after another to get people to join—societies, clubs, sewing meetings, socials, dramatics, dances, and so on; and the acquisition of spiritual power, and the increase of faith in the living God has to take second place, and is usually reserved for two hours on Sundays. I say has to, for it would seem under present conditions that if churches declared they existed for purely spiritual purposes they would be without congregations and without funds. This is the pity of it. I do not condemn social life in connection with churches, far from it, but this does not "meet and satisfy the yearnings of the soul," and it is for this that churches exist.

Ministers may preach sensational sermons, may launch out into politics, socialism, or any kindred subject, but they will only attract that class of person who seeks novelty, or who is entirely wrapped up in the particular subject in question; and they will alienate those who want spiritual food, who hunger and thirst after righteousness, who seek to know God. Much more might be said on this subject—the unsuitableness of some church buildings to inspire feelings of worship, the suitability, or otherwise, of some of our leaders, methods of work, and so on; but when all is said and done, if a church does not minister to the deepest instincts and the highest aspirations of the soul and demand "absolute surrender" of the will of man "to the will of God," it is not fulfilling its mission, and had better close its doors.—Yours, &c.,

Wolverhampton, July 15, 1914.

SIR,—I have read with much interest the exceedingly suggestive article by the Rev. Douglas Robson in your issue of July 4 on the "Decline in Public Worship." May I offer a few remarks from a layman's point of view? I thoroughly agree with most of what Mr. Robson has said, but is he correct in suggesting that the middle class is even gradually disappearing? No doubt combines and limited companies are constantly absorbing the small trader and manufacturer, but these larger concerns must, and do, employ large staffs, not a few of whom are responsible and well-paid men of the middle class. Apart from this, it surely follows that in any country where educational facilities are liberal the middle class must sooner or later increase. And this is of importance to us, for, as Mr. Robson points out, the churches have received the bulk of their support in the past from the middle class; and it is from this class primarily that we are to look for any revival in church interest in the future.

A change has, however, been going on for some time in our middle-class religious families. Church on Sundays when many of us were children was as regular as our meals. But now parents and children alike go to church as and when they choose. I can think of dozens of families almost, who, 10 to 15 years ago, were regular churchgoers, but who to-day, without being any less religious, are comparatively indifferent. Many spend their time, as Mr. Robson suggests, quietly, by doing a little work in the garden, or by visiting their friends.

Mr. Robson surely touches the root, or, at any rate, one root of the trouble, when he asks whether our church methods, organisation, &c., suit the requirements of this age, as they did those of the preceding generation. One often hears complaints as to church finance. It is said, and with truth, that a business run on the same lines as those of an average church would soon come to grief. Money is spent for various purposes, and for all kinds of societies. Even in normal times concerts, bazaars, lectures, and every conceivable way of raising money are organised, and the man in the pew cannot easily avoid subscribing one way or another to many objects, some of which he feels are not absolutely necessary to the welfare of his church. Then when large outlays such as structural alterations are contemplated, a loan from the bank is arranged, and upon the members is the responsibility of liquidating the debt. Is not the layman justified in objecting to this sort of finance?

Again, theological differences within the church have something to do with the poor statistics of to-day. No organisation can expect to succeed when its leaders not only differ, but refuse to agree to differ! Is it too much to hope that in the future theological differences may be discussed more in private, and things which are agreed upon confirmed in public?

Mr. Robson has pointed out many counter attractions to the church, and others might be named were it necessary. It is admitted on all sides that the general tendency of modern life militates against, rather than for, public worship. Yet one cannot, after all, avoid the uncomfortable feeling that a vast number of people would attend church to some extent if they felt they could get any good from it. They would waive the question of bad finance, they would care little for current fashions or tendencies, they would even be blind to internal theological trouble if through the medium of church life was made happier for them. And this brings the layman to ask one or two questions, in all friendliness, of his ministerial brothers.

Does the minister always know his congregation? The worries of business life and the exacting ties of home life are not less to-day than in times gone by. And the practical problems of life to-day are as great as ever. What does the average minister know of business life, of the office, the shop, or the warehouse? Most ministers spend some years in a training college. During that time how much do they see of the world they are to minister to? They read books; do they read men? A young man comes down from college with a full knowledge of what is going on in the theological world of his day. Very good; but does he also know what is worrying and perplexing men and women, injuring their moral and spiritual health? Can he really lead a congregation in prayer? The hymns he asks his congregation to sing, are they expressing the needs and feelings of to-day in the language of to-day? And can he make the men and women he addresses instinctively feel that he is in deep sympathy with them, and, knowing their difficulties, point them to a clearer and happier atmosphere?

I am not for one moment suggesting that the trouble is all on the side of the pulpit. I know full well it is not. But I cannot, as an interested onlooker, shut my eyes to the fact that whether orthodox or otherwise, Anglican or Plymouth Brother, the man who really knows the needs of his day and of his congregation, who will grapple with their problems and really help spiritually the individual members of his church, is not among those who have to record a decline in public worship in their churches.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. RODGERS.

Norbury, S.W., July 11, 1914.

SIR,—The interesting—painfully interesting—articles in THE INQUIRER on the above subject provoke discussion. “Why don’t people go to church?” May I say it is all a question of supply and demand. The supply exists—the demand doesn’t. Why is there such a poor demand?

As a mere layman I think I can see faults on the part of the church, viz., the ministers, and also on the part of the laity. Let me take the case of the latter first. As regards the intellectual aspect, the prevalence of agnosticism, the impatience with outworn creeds, I do not believe that these things enter at all largely into the question. If they did, there would be a rush for seats in every Unitarian church. One has yet to learn that in proportion to the liberty of the pulpit there is a corresponding increase of members in the pews. This is not so. Again, it is said that the modern man cannot attend church because he would be aiding in an organised hypocrisy. It is a contemptible argument, and, as a rule, is not believed in by the speaker himself. One might mention other reasons. Have we not heard them again and again—poor music, poor preaching, poor cushions, poor everything? I really believe that many men hold themselves superior to the foolish, antiquated, old-fashioned habit of attending divine worship.

Now I am going to make a statement entirely open to confirmation or otherwise. The folk in the main who never attend church seldom, if ever, attend intellectual gatherings of any kind. Debating societies, literary meetings, social study assemblies, political discussions, are left severely alone. Their reading takes the form of the lighter side of the very light halfpenny newspaper, with the addition of certain weekly journals which, too often, seem to be written for the edification of fools. In the matter of politics I shall be told I have made a sad mistake, that the crowded political meeting is a sufficient answer. Precisely! But under what conditions is your political meeting crowded? It is only when excitement reigns, when passion is aroused, when curiosity is urgent, when there is a prospect of some fun. Under such conditions—not difficult to realise—one might fill the largest church in Great Britain. But it would deceive no one into the belief that the public taste had ripened about church attendance. Start your political study class, and then see where the members are! Advertise a special economic conference and watch the magnificent audience which will not appear! In my opinion, the men and women who would, and who do, attend serious discussions on politics and the like are representative of those who would, and who do, attend churches. . . . Again, our Sundays are, for the most part, made up of special indulgence of the flesh. Frequently we eat and drink too much, we stay longer in bed, we cultivate the drawing-room sofa, we affect a state of convalescence. One asks very seriously whether all this makes for a due preparation for attending the house of prayer.

As a layman I could say much more about our faults of omission. I must confess I am tired of hearing so many miserable excuses that intelligent people indulge in. Just a word about the ministers. Services could be brightened; imagination might be more employed; sermons might be made more cheerful. There is a legend in Liverpool that Charles Beard once remarked he always liked to know the state of the cotton market before preaching to his congregation. Perhaps there is far too much “preaching” in the pulpit! The sermons which have most affected me have been of the “non-sermonic” character. The quiet, forceful appeal, delivered in a natural manner and having the bearing of a talk beside the study fire, has, in reality, a peculiar value of its own. Artificiality is the curse of religion. I am persuaded that no minister wants to be artificial, but I am also persuaded that unconsciously the spirit of artificiality often creeps in and spoils the service.

The warm note of personal attachment between pulpit and pew is also needed. If a sermon—as it often does—brings happiness and consolation to us, we, the laity, tell everyone about our joy—that is to say, everyone with the exception of the source of our pleasure. Surely this is an apt illustration of the curse of artificiality.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN AND TEMPERANCE REFORM.

SIR,—Neither in the Notes of the Week nor Mr. Thomas’s sermon, nor the memorial notice of Mr. Chamberlain, was any reference made to the splendid work which he did for temperance, and, as I think that no account of his life, however brief, should omit some mention of the late statesman’s attitude towards “the curse of the country,” as he rightly described the drink trade, I should be glad if you would give me an opportunity of recording the fact.

As municipal reformer, as Colonial Secretary, Mr. Chamberlain’s influence told heavily in favour of temperance reform, and he had the courage of his convictions, as is proved by such utterances as, "If I had a magic wand and could destroy in the people of England the desire for strong drink to-morrow, what changes we should see; we should see our taxes reduced by millions sterling; we should see our gaols and workhouses empty; we should see more lives saved in twelve months than are consumed in a century of bitter and savage war." And, again: "A priest-ridden people are to be pitied, but a publican-ridden people are to be despised."

He was optimistic enough to hope that the two great political parties would combine "to arrest the growing evil which is even now the curse of the country, the disgrace of our boasted civilisation, and the despair of our social reformers." Since those days a third party has arisen which is likely to do more for temperance than either of the older parties, and the work of such men as Mr. Chamberlain has made the task easier. More such are needed to-day, and (to quote Mr. Chamberlain again) "anything that can be done to diminish this terrible sacrifice of life and happiness is well worthy of all the attention and study which we can give it."

—Yours faithfully,

E. F. COWLIN.

JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN AND CARTER LANE CHAPEL.

SIR,—In your notice of the late Joseph Chamberlain you state, as do other papers, that he was a Sunday-school teacher at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham. But I have seen no notice of the fact that before he left London at the age of eighteen he was a Sunday-school teacher at Carter-lane Chapel while my father was minister there, as stated in "These Eighty Years," Vol. ii. p. 87. May I add a story I heard some time ago. At an early committee meeting when plans were discussed for the founding of Birmingham University, Joseph Chamberlain declared that the first building to be erected must be a Sienna Tower. Everyone else opposed this idea, but he was the man who knew what he wanted and how to get it, and in an hour's time all came round to his view; and there the tower stands.—Yours, &c.,

"NEW THOUGHT" AND MRS. EDDY.

SIR,—In a report of the first International New Thought Convention, appearing in your issue of the 11th inst., there is a statement that New Thought claims Mrs. Eddy as its god-mother. I would like to say that Mrs. Eddy has never had anything whatever to do with the New Thought movement or its formation. She is the discoverer and founder of Christian Science, which is the antithesis of that system.—Yours truly,

CO-EDUCATION.

SIR,—In continuation of my letter which appeared in your issue of April 25, could you spare me space to make known two recent German essays of high social and educational value—(a) "Co-education in Denmark," Frauenbildung, Heft 3, 1914; (b) "Co-education in Russia," Archiv für Pädagogik, Teile II., Jan., 1914.

In the last six years the number of Russian technical and commercial schools open to both girls and boys in all parts of the empire has greatly increased, as has also the number of girls attending the many mixed teachers' seminaries.

Articles on co-education in Germany and Denmark appeared in Women's Employment, June 5 and July 17, 1914.

I should be grateful if any of your readers could inform me of any recent literature regarding co-education in the secondary schools of Holland, where it has been so long in practice.—I am, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

CHAPTERS IN THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart. Handwörterbuch in gemeinverständlicher Darstellung, unter Mitwirkung von H. Gunkel und O. Scheel herausgegeben von F. M. Schiele und L. Zscharnack. In five volumes, half-bound, M.145. Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck).

THE fifth and concluding volume of this admirable work appeared at the beginning of the present year, and the publishers promise a supplementary volume, with a systematic survey of the contents, corrections and additions, and a full index.

"Religion in History and in the Present Day" is a fine achievement, which amply fulfils the promise of its title. It furnishes, as we said in a notice of the second volume three years ago, a demonstration in force of the liberal religious movement in Germany, and the editor, with his many fellow-workers, Gunkel, Scheel, Bousset, Titius, Troeltsch, Heitmüller, Johannes Weiss, Baumgarten, to mention only a few of the chief helpers, are to be warmly congratulated on the completion of their work. The first editor and practical originator of the undertaking has, unhappily, not lived to see the end. It was Dr. F. M. Schiele, to whom we owe also the remarkable series of the Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, who laid the foundation of this greater work. It was his idea. He produced the first sketch of the ground to be covered, and organised the whole undertaking; and although he was obliged by the failure of his health to relinquish his task as editor-in-chief into the capable hands of Dr. Zscharnack, the Encyclopædia remains a lasting monument to his faith and zeal, and his devoted service to the cause of truth and religion.

The final volume is as rich in interest as any of the others, and bears perhaps most decidedly of all marks of the struggle to secure within the necessary limits the due representation both of the historical treatment of religion in the past, and of the urgent problems of the present day. Thus Biblical scholarship and the historical and philosophical treatment of religion hold their own in the articles on Miracle, "Wunder" (23 cols.), and Baptism, "Taufe" (24 cols.), and other lesser articles, such as the interesting study of the first Christian community, "Urgemeinde" (9 cols.), and "Theismus" (11 cols.); while the modern interest, especially for Germans, finds full scope in Baumgarten's article "Wilhelm II., Deutscher Kaiser" (22 cols.), which deals very fully, and with some courage, with the religious utterances of the Imperial head of the Prussian Church, and concludes with a section on the Kaiser's attitude towards the democracy and the social aspirations of his people, and his own persistent efforts after social betterment. The religion of the Kaiser's grandfather, Wilhelm I., unimaginative but sincere, is also the subject of a sympathetic article (8 cols.) by the same writer. An example of contrast in editorial selection may be noted in the column given to C. M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," and the more meagre article on Servetus. There is a brief notice of C. W. Stubbs, though neither his advancement from the Deanery of Ely to his bishopric, nor his death, is recorded; and of the elder Stubbs, the late Bishop of Oxford, there is no mention.

The modern interest is further admirably represented in the article, with the thoroughly German compound title, "Volksbildungsbestrebungen" (8 cols.), by Emil Fuchs, whose election as Traub's successor at Dortmund the church authorities refused to confirm. The value of University extension and Settlement work in this country is fully appreciated, with due record of similar efforts in Germany, while the fine lead given by Germany in the matter of national insurance is described in the article on "Volksversicherung." Another instance of earnest modern effort we have in the article by Helene von Dungern, "Sittlichkeitsbestrebungen" (8 cols.), with its tribute to the heroic work of Josephine Butler, and its reference to the White Cross League, founded by the late Bishop of Durham, which has gained wide influence in Germany and Switzerland.

Three other articles among many we select for brief reference, and first the illuminating study of the religious art of Spain and the Netherlands in the 17th century, by Professor Franz Bock, of Posen (27 cols.), which illustrates in a very helpful way the contrast between the overpowering art of Rubens, the Catholic, under Jesuit influence, sensuous equally in his religious and worldly subjects, and the far deeper and more moving spiritual force in the work of Rembrandt, who grew up amid the heroic conflict of his people for liberty. Rembrandt Professor Bock hails as the greatest master of Christian art, because of the great religious as well as artistic genius in him.

Then there is an article, most timely in its appeal, though it strikes one rather as a paper suited to a religious congress than as a dictionary article, "Volkskunde, religiöse", (7 cols.), by the late Professor Drews, of Halle, a plea for the study of the actual mind of the people on the subject of religion. The article begins by pointing out that the majority of the clergy, trained in a different world of thought, and ignorant of what is going on in the mind of their people, fail of any helpful contact, and preach habitually over the heads of their hearers. This is particularly the case in village communities, but also among an industrial population and in other ranks of life, and the plea is for serious study and a thorough survey of this great and varied field of knowledge, practical acquaintance with which is essential to effectual ministry.

We have left to the last the article to which many of our readers will turn first, and with special interest, the article on Unitarians, "Unitarian" (6 cols.), by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold. It was a difficult subject for a new comer into the Unitarian fellowship to deal with, and Miss von Petzold has succeeded in giving an excellent and well-proportioned survey of the Unitarian movement in the early Reformation time, and in Poland and Hungary, and then in fuller detail of the movement in England and America. But the opening definition is unfortunate: "Unitarians are adherents of the Unitarian Church, who emphasise the doctrine of the unity of God as opposed to that of the Trinity, and reverence Jesus Christ as a divinely inspired teacher." The article itself shows that through long periods of the Unitarian movement there was no "Unitarian Church," and it is hardly too much to say that the majority of Unitarians have never belonged to such a church. Then as regards our own people, the divergence of judgment is well known as to the justification of the use of the name "Unitarian" for what are essentially free churches. An article which recognises Martineau as the leading champion of the Unitarians of the 19th century should certainly not have ignored that point in their history. Two or three errors of statement it will be well to note. Speaking of the broadening movement among the Presbyterians of the 18th century, Miss von Petzold says that by the Toleration Act they were pledged to the Trinitarian dogma, and "on that account kept to their old name," the inference being that otherwise they would have called themselves and their churches Unitarian. But that certainly was not the case; and again, the second of the two periods into which Unitarian history is divided is not accurately described as beginning with the founding and open recognition of Unitarian churches. The churches, for the most part, were already there before they became Unitarian, and the period did not begin, but rather culminated in the prevailing influence of Priestley's rationalism. Then in the third period, which is said to have begun with a new birth due to Channing's influence, Parker is loosely coupled with Channing, and put in point of time before Martineau. It is said that Martineau was "influenced by Channing and Parker," when he published his "Rationale" in 1835, but Parker was then a young man of twenty-five, as yet unknown to the world of religious thought. It was Emerson's Divinity School address in 1838 which first stirred him to speak out. Other errata are the dates of J. F. Clarke, which should have been 1810-88, and the spelling of the names Gannett and J. J. Tayler.

We have noticed the successive volumes of this dictionary with growing interest, and trust that what we have been able to say has been sufficient to indicate the quality of its living touch upon questions of present-day religious life, and its value to students of the history of religion. The high standard of its scholarship and the impartiality of its tone have been widely recognised in Germany, and not only by those who share the point of view of the large body of contributors. It is a work for the general reader to whom German is no barrier, provided he is seriously interested in religious thought and life. To such it will prove a welcome and most helpful companion.

V. D. D.

THE Cambridge University Press will shortly publish "The Church of England and Episcopacy," by Dr. A. J. Mason, Canon of Canterbury. The author has shown the views of Anglican writers, from the Reformation onwards, on the origin and sanction of episcopacy and on the relation between episcopal and non-episcopal bodies. While not claiming to be impartial, Dr. Mason endeavours to show both sides of the question, and offers his book as a contribution towards the solution of the questions raised by the Kikuyu Conference.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE REDSHANK'S STORY.

I.

"A SECOND brood! Do you really imagine, Mrs. Greenfinch, that I could rear two broods in one season? If you do, it proves that you know little about what it costs redshanks to rear one nestful. A second brood, indeed!" As she spoke, the bird raised herself to her full height on her long red legs, and looked right and left to see whether her three children, running about in the long wet herbage, were quite safe. She was standing on a high stone wall which enclosed a great field which had a pool of water—partly salt—at one end, and two or three wide ditches running across it. "I might manage it if we could keep our health in the close air and depressing gloom of a wood. We redshanks must live in the open; with all its perils it is more endurable than a stuffy wood."

"But we don't find the wood stuffy; neither do the owls or wood-peckers, or a host of other birds."

"Difference of constitution, I suppose," replied the redshank. "We require much exercise. We spend the winters in the open, too, on the other side of the railway embankment."

"What is it like over there?"

"Have you never been to see? My good bird! What you miss by never leaving your wood! Beyond the embankment there is a great bay full of beautiful blue sea water when the tide is up, and when it goes out there are miles and miles of sand and mud, where you can always find plenty to eat."

"Plenty of seeds?" asked the other bird, thinking of her own winter food.

"No seeds, but worms and tiny shell fish. It is fun to dig for them in the soft wet sand. We never eat seeds, even when we come into these grassy flats to make our nests. We came in May."

"Yes, we all knew when you had arrived for we heard your cheerful 'leero-leero leero' ringing down the long ditch; and it was a pleasant change after the everlasting 'pee-a-wit' 'pee-a-wit' of the lapwings. Where was your nest made?"

"Nearly in the middle of this forty-acre field. The weather was very wet, and the field half flooded with the overflow of the spring tide, so we soon made a hole in a nice sloppy place in the grass."

"Did you dig a hole with your long bills?"

"No, we stooped down and turned round and round, pressing the soft wet earth with our bodies till a shallow basin was made."

"What did you line it with?"

"Nothing at all; the surrounding herbage was all pressed down as we turned, and made lining enough. Sometimes in places where there is no grass we have to collect bents or fine twigs of heather."

"But no soft stuff? No hair or feathers?"

"No, our eggs are thick-shelled, so don't need as much padding as yours. I wonder how you ever hatch your thin-shelled eggs without breaking them."

"Oh, we never break them, for we get on and off the nest very gently, and try never to hurry," said the greenfinch.

"All very well for you in your thick holly bush; but you don't have to flee from your nest in terror of your life as often as we do. Now I'll give you my experience, and then you'll see if it is any wonder that we sometimes hurry off our nests. As I told you, the field was quiet enough when we made our nest, and so it was till I had laid my second egg; but one morning as I had just settled down to lay a third, I saw several people leaning over that wall on the top of the bank, and staring, as I thought, at me. But it turned out that three horses had just been brought into this field—our field, if you please—without leave asked, and were having their halters taken off. A moment later they kicked up their great heels and came galloping down towards me like mad creatures. There were at least a dozen nests on the grass besides mine, lapwings' as well as redshanks'; and up in a dry corner a lark's. We all rose in the air, and each bird shouted to them to go away, till the air was full of our cries of 'pee-a-wit' and 'tchit-tchit'; but they took no notice, and dashed on over the sloppy ground, making the water go 'squitch squitch' in the wettest places, and sending muddy drops flying behind them. In a few minutes they stopped for breath before they began to graze, and we stole back to our nests, but we kept rising a little to peep over the grass and see if they were coming our way, for one step of those huge feet would crush us and our eggs to a pulpy mass. However, all went well as far as our nest was concerned, though before night I heard more than one bird telling a tale of distress and anxiety down at the pool end of the field where there were more passers-by. Next day was fine and dry. I had just dropped into a doze after laying my fourth and last egg, when I heard human voices, and saw three women on the bank overlooking the field. 'What bird can that be?' said one of them. 'I fancy it is a redshank,' replied another. I trembled, for I thought they had seen me, but it was my husband, who had seen them and had begun, as the dear fellow always does, to try to distract their attention from me and our nest by doing his flying exercises. He wheeled about and cried 'tchit-tchit.' One lady had field-glasses in her hand, and turning them on him began to describe him to her friends. 'Yes, the legs are red,' she said, 'but other birds have red legs; read the description in our book, and I'll see if this is really a redshank. I'm pretty sure it is, because when it alighted on the wall it laid its wings together for a moment and showed the white lining very plainly.' Then they went in the most heartless way through the list of all our distinguishing features, as they called them. 'Upper parts, ash-brown, streaked with darker brown; under parts, white, breast streaked with brown; secondaries nearly white—' 'What are secondaries?' asked one of the others. I didn't know we had such things, or rather I did not know them by that name; but the field-glass lady explained that they were the quill feathers starting from the second or middle joint of the wing. Next they read out that we had a white rump and white tail, barred with blackish. 'There, look at his tail,' they cried, 'now he flies you can see it is like a white fan with a black edge; and there is a broad white line across the wings. The bill, too, is just right—black at the tip and red at the base.' Then they noted how, when my mate alighted, he drooped his head and shoulders forward several times. They said that was just what redshanks did. While they were watching him I slipped off the nest and joined him, when at once they noticed that I was rather bigger than he, and were sure I was the hen bird, for their book told them the hen would be the larger, and it is true of me."

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. H. R. TAVENER.

THE death of the Rev. Horace Ruskin Tavenor, which occurred with tragic suddenness, while he was bathing before breakfast in the river Derwent, in Borrowdale, was briefly recorded last week. At the inquest, which was held at Leathes Cottage that same evening, the Rev. V. D. Davis, who was acting as host to the Manchester College holiday party, and his son, who was bathing with Mr. Tavenor at the time, gave an account of the occurrence. They had no knowledge of any hidden weakness of the heart in one of such abounding energy and vigour and unfailing good spirits; but from what his father and other friends have since told of him it seems clear that there must have been a heart seizure, which from the first rendered all the efforts that were made to induce artificial respiration of no avail. Such measures were at once taken as soon as he was brought up to the cottage, first by a brave young Girl Guide, who was of the party, and by one of the students, and then by two young men staying near by, and afterwards by the doctor also, who quickly motored out from Keswick. For over an hour the efforts were continued, but without the smallest sign of hope. So the young life was swiftly cut off in the midst of his joy in that glorious country and the happy fellowship of the holiday party, and now there is the quiet grave in Rosthwaite churchyard, circled by the great hills, where what was mortal of our friend was laid to rest on Wednesday evening, July 8. His father and sister were there, and the members of the Leathes Cottage party. Mr. Davis conducted the service, and was joined in it by the Rev. Alfred Hall, who, with Mr. Duncan Donald, came over from Newcastle. Mr. G. H. Leigh, President of the Manchester Domestic Mission, was also present, and Mr. Thornton, of Leeds, representing Mr. Tavenor's former congregation at Hunslet. The drive up the dale was through a heavy downpour of rain, but it cleared in time for the service, and gleams of beautiful sunlight passed across the green hillside while the words of farewell and of trust were spoken by the grave.

Horace Tavenor's early years were spent in London. Born in Islington, January 12, 1885, he was the second son of the Rev. Lucking Tavenor, now of Aberdeen, and after leaving school at fifteen he had six years of hard work in the publishing office of the English Churchman, as clerk to the manager. But the growing purpose of his life was to devote himself to the ministry of religion, and through much difficulty and discouragement he held to that purpose, and at last achieved it. When he was 21 he spent a year with his father, then minister at Ipswich, and was helped in his studies by the Rev. Alfred Hall, at Norwich. But he had not the gift of scholarship or rapid acquisition, and found very serious obstacles in his way. He was twice rejected in his attempt to pass the entrance examination of the Home Missionary College in Manchester. Then, out of his very despair, as he told the writer of this notice in an hour of intimate companionship on the hills only two days before his death, there came to him the conviction, with the deep assurance of a Divine promise, that he yet would find the way to the service he desired. And the way did open. He was enabled to go to Liverpool for two years, to work at the Mill-street Domestic Mission, at the same time attending classes at the University, and then for two more years was admitted as a special student to Manchester College, Oxford. This course of preparation was fully justified when in the summer of 1911 he went to Leeds as minister of the Hunslet Church; and when last autumn he entered on the charge of the Willert-street Domestic Mission in Manchester, it was with the happiest prospect of a ministry exactly after his own heart, in a work of companionship and sympathy among the poor of the great city, for which he was eminently fitted.

One act of heroism on his part, while he was at Leeds, must not remain unrecorded. It was at Christmas, 1912. A man in an iron foundry had been shockingly injured by molten metal, and the doctor said the only chance to save his life was to cover the wounds of the burning with skin taken from another healthy body. None of the man's friends would take the risk, but when Tavenor heard of it he at once offered himself. Three large pieces of skin were taken from his body, and the man's life was saved. But he, in his exuberant energy and disregard of self, went about as usual. He had a party of young people that same evening, and next day preached a Christmas sermon in Mill Hill Chapel, and took no proper rest. Only months afterwards friends discovered how he was seriously suffering, and he was compelled to go away for some weeks to rest that he might make a proper recovery.

That was characteristic of his whole ministry. He gave himself with unsparing devotion to his people, with a high ideal of service and a beautiful spirit of brotherly kindness. He was a boy among his boys, running with the harriers, swimming with them, their leader in all athletic pursuits and in the higher interests of life, and at the same time unwearingly faithful in the care of all branches of the Mission work. He gave himself with what his friends have felt to be a reckless energy, but it was in the noble spirit of an earnest Christian man, consecrated to the ministry of the deeper things of God, true and brave and tender, and with the joy of youth. He has passed from this scene of his eager service and from the circle of his friends, but surely not to idleness, and not into the shadows, but into the light of God. We think of him as entering, through the mystery of the Divine calling, into the greater fulness of life and higher service, while his memory remains still to exercise the ministry of life in the hearts of those who knew and loved him.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE PLUMAGE BILL.

THE prospect of the Plumage Bill being abandoned, after passing its second reading by 297 votes to 15, and reaching the Committee stage, has caused dismay in the ranks of its supporters. We cannot do better than quote the protest which Mr. Galsworthy has sent to the Times. If, Mr. Galsworthy points out, this Government Bill is jettisoned for want of time, "something like despair of ever making good another measure which has for its object the abolition of suffering to helpless creatures will seize upon us all. So many of these measures are waiting. Such a great and ever-increasing public is eager to see them passed that, if this Plumage Bill, subject of years of effort and desire, overwhelmingly approved by public and Parliamentary opinion, within an ace of being placed on the Statute-book, is thrown overboard at the last minute for want of time, a real shiver of disgust must pass through us all—not at the indifference or heartlessness of members of Parliament—what can they do save record their overwhelming vote?—but at the impotence of the Parliamentary machine, as now constituted, to register the wishes of the people's representatives. I beg the Government, before deciding to abandon this Bill, to note that it stands, not for itself alone, but for a whole class of Bills knocking at the door, Bills behind which are hundreds of thousands of people more and more irritated and disheartened that measures of obvious humanity are put off year after year. In this Session we have seen decisive expressions of Parliamentary opinion recorded in favour of better conditions for children, and the blind; against the worn-out horse traffic; against the vivisection of dogs; above all, against this importation of the plumage of wantonly destroyed birds. Is nothing to be done? No single one of these mandates in favour of the helpless to be carried into law? No single one?"

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

THE Rev. T. P. Spedding sends us further details of the progress of the Van Mission. The mission at Tredegar was continued for five weeks, and for every night during that period meetings were held with audiences ranging from 200 to 500. As already reported, a society has been formed, services are now being held in a public hall, and the South-East Wales Society has undertaken the care of the movement when the Van passes from the neighbourhood. The Rev. W. T. Lucan Davies, of Newport, will continue to hold open-air meetings each week for some time, and the Society will send supplies on alternate Sundays, the Tredegar friends making themselves responsible for the conduct of the meeting on the intervening Sundays. The Mission has had the help of some well-known missionaries. The first meetings were held by Mr. Sorenson, and while he was responsible the decision was made to hold a meeting with a view to the formation of a society. The Rev. H. B. Smith conducted the next week's mission, and he had the pleasure of presiding over the formation meeting. The Rev. W. T. Davies and Mrs. Davies were the next missionaries, and the series of meetings has been finished by the Rev. Fred Hall. The length of the stay at Tredegar has considerably modified the programme for this particular Van, and some of the towns which were to have been visited are postponed.

Equally satisfactory reports are to hand of the work of the Northern Van, which, after meetings at Runcorn, conducted by the Rev. W. McMullan; at Chester by the Rev. W. R. Shanks, and at Buckley and Connah's Quay by the Rev. E. T. Russell, has now entered on its coast run to Carnarvon. At all these places the Mission made its mark, and in every case it was asked to stay longer or to come again. At Chester, where the missionaries had the advantage of the help of the friends of the fine old chapel, the results far exceeded anticipations; and keen interest was displayed in the other towns which were visited by the Van for the first time.

Little improvement is recorded in the Midland meetings. At Staveley, where Dr. Thackray took the meetings; at Eckington, with the Rev. T. Anderson; and at Highgate, with Mr. Pipkin, one of the Pioneer Preachers, there were very few meetings that had the size of audience that was naturally hoped for. The missionaries made amends for the small attendances by busying themselves among the people, and were very hospitably received. Dr. Thackray was invited to take a Sunday meeting at a large adult school, and Mr. Pipkin conducted some fine meetings for young folk. The Van is now in the midst of the district where the Rev. T. Anderson is carrying on his useful missionary work for the Sheffield Union, and some improvement will probably be noticed from this point.

In London meetings have been held at Walthamstow, Limehouse and Stepney. Several ministers, the Pioneer Preachers, and some of the Lay Preachers have co-operated, and all the way round fine meetings have been held. At Stepney, the friends of the College Green Chapel helped most enthusiastically, and were busy among the audiences each evening. At Limehouse some violent hostility was experienced, and matters wore an ugly look for a few minutes, but sufficient men closed round the missionary to secure his protection, and on the succeeding night, although opposition had been threatened, the proceedings passed off quietly. It is interesting to note that while threats have been used more than once, this is the first time in nine years that any personal violence has been attempted.

A friend writes asking that at least the sites of the London meetings might be advertised in the papers. This should be done if any certainty could be guaranteed. But at any time open-air meetings are liable to be forestalled, and to removal. This week the meetings have been held close by Forest Gate Station.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Birkenhead.—In connection with the Unitarian Church a garden party and sale of work were held on Saturday, July 4, at Oakhurst, Grosvenor-road, by kind permission of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Willmer. During the afternoon two performances were given by children of a fairy play by Miss A. E. Clephan. The sale realised the sum of £30.

Hinckley.—The induction service upon the appointment of the Rev. Herbert H. Jones, the new minister of the Great Meeting congregation, was held on Thursday, July 9, conducted by the Rev. H. MacLachlan, Tutor and Warden of the Home Missionary College, Manchester. Dr. Mellone, Principal of the College, gave the charge to the minister, and the charge to the congregation was given by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, minister of the Great Meeting, Leicester. A welcome meeting was afterwards held in the chapel under the presidency of Mr. Arthur Davenport (chairman of the Chapel Committee). Mr. Walter Johnson, on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. S. P. Grimley (superintendent of the Sunday school) extended a hearty welcome to the new minister, and the Rev. H. C. Crow (Congregational), the Rev. P. A. Hudgell (Baptist), and the Rev. A. Surtees (Primitive Methodist), on behalf of the Free Churches of the town, also gave Mr. Jones a hearty welcome to co-operate with them in the field of religious work. The Rev. E. I. Fripp, the Rev. E. O. Jenkins (pastor of the church to which Mr. Jones belonged), Principal Mellone, the Rev. H. MacLachlan, and Mr. Albert Whitford (student of the Home Missionary College) also spoke in cordial terms, wishing Mr. Jones God speed in his mission. Letters of apology were read by the secretary (Mr. R. Ginns) from the Rev. W. G. Price (of Hale), the Rev. T. J. Jenkins (of Newchurch), former ministers of the Great Meeting, Hinckley; and the Rev. F. Cowles (Wesleyan). Mr. Jones briefly responded, saying that he had come to unite on one common ground with all religious workers, as the days of creeds and dogmas had passed. A programme consisting of musical items composed by the late Mr. H. Atkins, an honoured member and choirmaster of the chapel, followed.

Leeds: Hunslet.—On Sunday evening, July 5, the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., preached to a large congregation, and made special reference to the recent death of the Rev. H. R. Tavener, who was minister of the Unitarian church for two years, up to a year ago, when he accepted a call to the Willert-street Domestic Mission, Manchester. At the conclusion of the service, on the proposition of the Rev. F. Coleman, the present minister, a resolution was passed, expressing the respect and affection of the congregation for Mr. Tavener, and their sympathy with his relatives. Mr. Hargrove also made sympathetic reference to the memory of the late Mrs. Thornton, who was a member of the congregation, and unveiled a memorial brass to her memory.

Manchester.—The annual meeting of the Missionary Conference was held on July 2, at the Memorial Hall, under the presidency of the Rev. Professor Moore. The proceedings commenced with a communion service conducted by the President and the Rev. D. Agate. At the open conference papers were read by the Rev. G. L. Phelps on "The Motive of Missionary Effort," and by the Rev. J. Worthington, of Belfast, on "Constructive Principles." Several new members were elected, and were welcomed to the conference by the Rev. D. Agate. The officers were elected as follows:—President, the Rev. J. H. Bibby; vice-president, the Rev. Professor Moore; treasurer, the Rev. J. M. Bass; secretary, the Rev. W. T. Bushrod. The conference closed with prayer by the Rev. J. Evans.

Manchester.—On Sunday, July 12, a memorial service for the late Rev. H. R. Tavener was held in the Willert-street Domestic Mission. The seating accommodation was taxed to its utmost, and among those present were the Rev. L. Tavener, Miss Tavener, Mr. W. Tavener, Mr. Whiteley (of Hunslet), members of the mission committee, also the 1st Collyhurst troop of boy scouts. The Rev. Dendy Agate, conducted the service.

and delivered an address. Mr. Tavener, whose loss was a common sorrow, too deep for words, he said, commenced his labours at the Domestic Mission in Liverpool under the leadership of the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones. From there he went to Manchester College, Oxford, for studious labours. "I was particularly interested in him," continued Mr. Agate, "because his first ministry was in the same church where my own ministry commenced nearly forty years ago, namely Hunslet." He remained there nearly two years, and the Domestic Mission Committee thought they were singularly fortunate when they secured him for Willert-street. His was a short ministry, but he had left his mark. He had a delightful combination of gifts, a sympathetic heart, a cheerful spirit, and youth. He never felt that what he did for anyone was a trouble. Elders looked upon him as a son, the children greeted him with smiles, the youths looked upon him as an elder brother. He brought sunshine into the houses he visited, and it was impossible to feel dull in his company. He was a helper of this world's joy, whose influence would abide and spread through long years to come. Letters were read from friends of Mr. Tavener in the ministry at the close of the service.

Norwich.—On July 5 the new minister of the Octagon Chapel, the Rev. Lawrence Redfern, conducted the services on the occasion of the Sunday school anniversary. The beautiful old building had been decorated by ladies of the congregation, and the services were well attended. On Tuesday evening, July 7, a welcome meeting was held, when about 150 members and friends assembled to meet Mr. Redfern in the Martineau Memorial Hall. Mr. G. A. King (chairman of the congregation) presided, and short speeches of welcome were made by various ladies and gentlemen, each of whom represented some one or more special department of church work. Mr. Redfern, in the course of his reply, referred to the condition of organised religion at the present moment. The times, he said, were marked by the decay of sectarian zeal and motive. Another ideal of the function of a religious institution was being cherished; men were beginning to lay emphasis on those things on which they agreed rather than on those things about which they differed. The problem for organised religion at the present day was how the soul of our modern civilisation might be adequately represented. There were great impulses moving human society. There was the impulse for life itself, which lay behind all business activity. There was the impulse for social righteousness, which lay behind all our legislation and agitation for reform. There was the impulse for beauty, which lay behind all the arts which give joy to life. And, lastly, there was the impulse for spiritual perfection, which lay behind all religions, and was common to all men. This was a hunger implanted in every human soul. The Church should be the means whereby this hunger might be satisfied, it should become an adequate expression of the spiritual life of its people.

Ringwood.—On Thursday, July 9, the annual treat of the Band of Hope in connection with St. Thomas's Chapel was held by the kindness of Mrs. Cogan Conway, in the grounds of "Brooklands," Ringwood. On Sunday, July 12, special services were held in commemoration of the re-opening of the chapel after decoration. An endeavour has been made to preserve a restrained and quiet style of ornament suitable to the date of the building (1728). The walls are colour-washed in a pale shade of buff and the woodwork uniformly stained dark oak. The sermons were preached by the Rev. Neone Raad, M.A. Collections were taken on behalf of the decoration fund. The congregation wish to take this opportunity of thanking the friends who have so kindly contributed towards the expenses. Ten pounds is still required to clear the debt, and donations will be gratefully received by Mrs. Conway, hon. treasurer to St. Thomas's Chapel.

Sheffield.—The annual united picnic of the congregations connected with the Sheffield and District Unitarian Association took place on Thursday, 9th inst., at Edlington Woods. A short meeting was held, at which brief addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. Anderson, C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin, and P. W. Jones. It was announced that the congregation of the Free Christian Church, Doncaster, had applied to be received as members of the Association. A large number of members of the Doncaster Church were present.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

Pessimism is alien to the souls of men and women who live by faith, but it is difficult to read the account of the welcome accorded to the French boxing champion, Carpentier, by an enthusiastic crowd on Tuesday without some feeling of sadness and apprehension. Carpentier is, we believe, quite a striking personality, besides being good-looking, and a friend of Maeterlinck, who takes a curious delight in pugilists; but the fact that he is received everywhere like a royal personage, and made the idol of the hour, throws a significant light on the tendencies of the age and the forms of hero-worship most prevalent in the greatest city in the world. "It is doubtful," says the Times—and the Times never emulates the halfpenny press in exuberance of style—"if such a scene of enthusiasm has any parallel in the annals of British sport. Not only was the yard at Charing Cross and the entrance to the station filled to bursting point, but for quite a considerable distance along the Strand in either direction there was a seething mass of humanity waving tricolors and cheering till they were hoarse." A huge crowd blocked Northumberland-avenue, extending as far as the hotel to which Carpentier was escorted with tremendous acclamation, and it was some time before the people could be induced to disperse even after the hero they were delighting to honour had appeared on the balcony and shouted a few words of thanks.

This reminds us that there has been some discussion lately as to the suitability of women appearing at boxing-matches, and there are many signs that the conventions are fast being broken down in this direction as in all other directions. Such a discussion will doubtless have little interest for readers of THE INQUIRER, but it has a certain ominous significance none the less, and the plea can no longer be put forward that it is not in the nature of women, as women, to adopt an aggressive attitude, or to shrink from any of the experiences—even brutal ones—that were formerly supposed to be the exclusive privileges of men. Most of us would probably agree that if the spectacle of two world-renowned boxers contesting in the ring for a prize and stakes of several thousand pounds is not a particularly edifying one, it is as demoralising for men as for women. When these questions are looked at from the moral and humanitarian standpoint the question of sex hardly enters in, and we are only concerned with what is degrading to the human spirit in general. But the really appalling thing is that a recrudescence of methods of violence and the glorification of the fighting instinct is sweeping over the world, and finding an outlet not only in the coercive acts of Governments, the passionate rebellion of the workers, the increasing bitterness of party strife, the habits of invective and denunciation which characterise the debates in legislative assemblies, the methods of fanning the war-spirit adopted by a section of the press, and even the modern forms of art as exemplified by Futurists, Vorticists, and the rest of the insurgents. This is the real menace of civilisation.

CRAFTSMEN OF FIVE THOUSAND YEARS AGO.

It is a salutary thing to study the records of past achievements, if only that our pride in our own attainments may be checked before it becomes blatant conceit. Professor Flinders Petrie, who has done so much to familiarise us with the records of a remote past, reminds us in an article in the Daily News and Leader that "the taste to devise and the ability to execute" were quite as good in the days of ancient Egypt as they have been ever since. The jewellery which London is now admiring at University College, for instance, "shows that five thousand years ago the art of the goldsmith was as delicate and as perfect as it has been at any later time. The gold is joined with a minuteness and finish which cannot be exceeded; the art of gold-soldering was already perfect, and it had been perfect even two thousand years earlier, at the very beginning of all written history. The smooth fitting of long sliders proves how true and precise was the construction and how clean the handling of the work. The cutting of hundreds of minute pieces of inlay of hard stones needed the greatest skill; so small are they that they can only be handled now by lifting them clinging to a wetted needle." No less remarkable was the skill brought to bear on the working of granite; nor was this only a mechanical dexterity. "The portrait statues in the hardest stones, and in the smoothest ivory, are alike triumphs of dignified representation of character. Never has an artist shown better the nobility of great resolve and high capacity for action; these figures portray real rulers of men, who could foresee the results of their action and devise what was best for all. We know the appearance, and can realise the nature of these men, as well as we can that of men of our own time."

CHANGES AT ASOLO.

Asolo is no more—that is to say, not the Asolo that Robert Browning knew, and which is for ever associated with his name. The little village above the Trevisan plain, we learn from Canon Rawsley, who has been writing on the subject in the Manchester Guardian, is now connected with Montebelluna by a tramway that clangs and hoots, and a service of automobiles which run through Asolo has been started to connect Castel Franco—Giorgione's birthplace—on the South, with Passagno—Canova's birthplace—on the north. "The result is patent in building operations that are disfiguring the chestnut glades to the south of the town, and in a year or two villadom will be much in evidence. Meanwhile the Casa Scotti, in which the son of the poet known to his friends as Pen Browning died, and which was still undergoing restoration at the time of his death, on the eastern slope of the Rocca, remains unsold. His peacocks that used to strut and scream on the terraces of the forecourt scream no longer. As for the beautiful studio and the Torricella which he built to carry out his father's wish on part of what was once Queen Cornaro's garden in the days she held high court here, it has been sold to an American composer, who had set 'Pippa Passes' to music, and, coming to Asolo that he might localise his work, fell in love with the place, and forthwith purchased it. He, too, is obliged to add certain necessary outbuildings to enable it to be habitable, for in the younger Browning's life it was but a studio."

But these external changes are not so great as the change which took place in the mind of Browning himself, when, in surrendering himself utterly to the conception of a transcendent God, he seemed to lose all the rapture and splendour of his youthful communion with Nature. "At Asolo, my Asolo," he tells us, in words that are singularly affecting, "when I was young, all natural objects were palpably clothed with fire. They mastered me, not I them. Terror was in their beauty. I was like Moses before the Bush that burned. I adored the splendour I saw. Then I was in danger of being content with it; of mistaking the finite for the infinite beauty. To be satisfied—that was the peril. Now I see the natural world as it is, without the rainbow hues the soul bestowed upon it. Is that well? In one sense, yes. . . . All is distinct, naked, clear, Nature and nothing else. Have I lost anything in getting down to fact instead of to fancy? Have I shut my eyes in pain—pain for disillusion? No—now I know that my home is not in Nature; there is no awe and splendour in her which can keep me with her." It is impossible not to feel that in making this confession Brownin had temporarily lost his way in the joy of a new and more vital experience. Had he realised God's immanence as deeply as he realised his transcendence, Nature would still have appeared to him, as at Asolo, "palpably clothed with fire."

DRINK NOT "FOLLOWING THE FLAG."

One of the most interesting statements made at the International Congress of Tropical Agriculture held recently at the Imperial Institute had reference to the native drink trade. It was stated that Belgium now prohibited the trade in spirits throughout the Belgian Congo and other great regions; France prohibited the sale of absinthe to natives in all her West African possessions, and Germany and Great Britain had also taken strong steps in the matter.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

CONFERENCE is in itself a word of good omen. It means that men among whom there is a strong difference of opinion have agreed to come together to see whether the medium of private conversation will help them to reach mutual agreement without surrender of essential points of principle. Many of the sharpest disputes both in religion and politics become bitter and irreconcilable because there are no links of mutual sympathy and no effort at mutual understanding. To confer is to escape from the atmosphere of the platform, the newspaper, even of the House of Commons, and to give free play to more human relationships. The surprising thing is that it should require all the paraphernalia of royal intervention to bring political opponents together in this way. Whether the Conference, about which everybody has been talking this week, will produce any practical fruit of agreement no one at the moment is able to say. But we hope that it will at any rate make it more natural for opponents to confer in future, and do something to check the "die-hard" attitude which has become far too prevalent in public affairs lately. This spirit which says I will yield nothing, I will discuss nothing, give me what I demand or I will blow you to pieces, is equally hateful in Liberal or Conservative, in Labour leader or reformer, in man or woman. Religious men should be the first to say, "Come, let us reason together." That is essentially the spirit and atmosphere of conference, and we fully admit that the theologian needs it quite as much as the politician.

FRIDAY of last week was the day for the slaughter of the innocents in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister announced the Bills which must be dropped owing to lack of time. About others he expressed a pious hope that they might be allowed to go through by consent. Among the latter he included the Plumage Bill. He and his colleagues, he said, were very strongly in favour of it, and anxious it should pass during the present session. But it had been relentlessly and ably opposed in Committee and had the prospect of having to encounter that opposition again on the Report stage unless something could be done. He earnestly hoped that some arrangement might be come to between the promoters of the Bill and the very tenacious group of opponents, so as to narrow the ambit of the controversy and enable the Bill to pass this session.

As enthusiastic supporters of the Plumage Bill from the beginning, we can only regard these words as cold comfort. It seems monstrous that there should be any real difficulty about a Bill which was carried on second reading by a majority of 297 to 15; but the opposition to it, though confined to a very few members, has been determined and well-organised. It is a case in which a trade, driven into its last ditch, has set itself to defy the humanitarian sentiment of the country, and unfortunately the antiquated forms of the House of Commons play into the hands of an interested minority. Even the Times has thrown itself strongly into the movement for the immediate passage of the Bill:—
"While every decent feeling calls for the suppression of this stupid and cruel traffic, the discussion of the Bill and its predecessors by Parliamentary Committees has shown that the loss of employment in this country due to the passage of the Bill will be extremely small. England acts as a broker and distributor in this traffic, rather than as a manufacturer. Only a few hundred workpeople in this country are even partially employed in making up the feathers which the Bill proposes to exclude. . . . Only the immediate passage of the Plumage Bill, with its policy of national exclusion, will close the great market in this country to the already circumscribed trade, and help to save many threatened species by a further great reduction of the demand for their skins."

In face of this great volume of public opinion is Parliament really powerless to give effect to the national will?

* * *

At the annual meeting of the Balkan Committee last week Lord Bryce, speaking as one who had long laboured for the welfare of the Balkan peoples, referred in very grave terms to the recent conduct of some of the Christian States. There had been a regrettable expulsion of Moslems from the territories of the Christian Powers. The Moslem was as much entitled to civil and religious liberty as the Christian, and those who had been delivered in the name of freedom and equality ought to apply those principles to their own subjects, as they asked for them to be applied to themselves in the past. Three consequences, he warned them, must follow the oppression of subject minorities by the Christian States. A State which adopted such methods destroyed its claim to be what we call a free country. It was of the essence of freedom that minorities should be protected. Further, the consequence must be to alienate from the State which practised oppression the sympathy of the free peoples of Europe and the United States, who had in times past stood by the Eastern Christians. If these States oppressed their minorities of different language and nationalities as the Turks did, they would destroy that sympathy, and lose the moral support which, as they must acknowledge, had been of such great value to them. The third consequence would be that this oppression would produce among the subject populations conspiracies, insurrections, and ultimately wars.

* * *

At the close of his speech Lord Bryce made the following appeal to the Balkan States: "Put an end to your racial passions and hatreds. Think of improving your countries by the worth of the Christian name in which your victories have been won. Remember that in the end a contented and united people is the strongest as well as the happiest people. Do not provoke fresh discontent and suffering in a land which has already suffered so much."

We hope that these words will not fall upon deaf ears. But let it also be remembered that we cannot entirely divest ourselves of responsibility, or reasonably expect peoples who have been deliberately kept divided and uncivilised to suit the purposes of European diplomacy to escape at once from the curse which others have inflicted on them. What we have been witnessing in the Balkans is the horror of mediæval warfare, with its aftermath of cruelty and pillage. The conditions are of a kind which it is impossible for the modern world to tolerate; but justice, liberty, and peace must be matters of slow growth among these small States, whose whole life has been poisoned by the policy of treating them as pawns in a diplomatic game.

* * *

"A DISMAL, unsatisfactory, and humiliating end to the terrifically advertised boxing match for the white heavy-weight championship of the world." So the Manchester Guardian begins its description of the great prize fight at Olympia last week. "I have come from the ugliest scene I have witnessed in my life, a foul scene, a hateful scene, a scene that I shall never forget, and that I shall never remember without a sense of shame." These are the words of A. G. G. in the Daily News and Leader. "When I got out through the struggling mass into the clean air, and the summer night, and saw the crowds of people promenading in happy unconsciousness of Olympia and all its works, I felt that I had passed into the wholesome world again, and that it were good to have shaken the dust of the prize ring off one's feet."

WE know that it was chiefly the foul unsportsmanlike blow, the infamy of hitting a man when he is down, which inspired these biting words. But other people, and ourselves among the number, will endorse them and apply them to the whole performance—this vulgar, demoralising recrudescence of the prize-ring in our midst. It does not make its appeal to the love of clean sport or our healthy English devotion to games. It preys upon brutal instincts, and is sordid through and through. We confess to some surprise that newspapers of high repute have given so much space to florid descriptions of it, sparing us none of the disgusting physical details. It is true that Borrow and Meredith have imparted some of the lustre of literary tradition to the ring and helped to turn even mild-mannered people into apologists for it, on the ground that it is so typically English; but we hope that "Gunboat" Smith's foul blow last week has given its quietus to this kind of sentimentalism. We might on precisely the same ground plead for cock-fighting and bull-baiting and many another ingredient of the old fashioned English fair.

* * *

LIKE most other Church Assemblies the Methodist Conference at Leeds has been marked by a note of anxiety. Speaker after speaker has dwelt upon half-filled chapels, the disinclination of the new generation to observe Methodist discipline, and the defection of a multitude of people from organised religion altogether. It was only natural that many remedies should have been suggested, and that in an assembly largely composed of ministers it should be taken for granted that if only the people can be got back into the churches all will be well. A plan for trying to organise a good attendance on two Sundays next January was received with great favour, though it seems to us that machine-like devices of this kind are usually the prerogative of small minds and unspiritual men. But underlying this appetite for surface remedies there was a deeper note. No church can command success, but it can at least try to deserve it, by meeting its difficulties bravely, by a spirit of trust and docility amid new conditions which at present it only dimly understands, and above all by prayerful waiting upon God. A church which is really charged with a divine life and a divine message will draw men by an irresistible attraction. It is the secret of every epoch of religious revival.

THE new President of the Methodist Conference is the Rev. Dinsdale T. Young. There is much in his opening address with which we are in close agreement. He pleaded that they were part of the Holy Catholic Church of Christ. He claimed that they were "the friends of all and the enemies of none." He also spoke a clear word on behalf of theology, in the sense that religious feeling is quite inadequate without religious thought. It was a sorry temper which sought to cry down theology. The Methodist Church should always be unequivocally theological. An untheological church meant an unintelligent church, and an unintelligent church could never maintain its position as a great saving factor in the land.

At a later stage of his address, however, Mr. Young abandoned this healthy challenge to real thinking and committed himself to a doctrine of Scriptural infallibility expressed in conventional language, which must have been a rude shock to many of the younger ministers, who know that there is no help either for themselves or the new generation in that direction. As an individual, he said, he held the old views concerning the inspiration of Scripture. He wished to involve no one else. But to him the Bible was from cover to cover—rightly translated and rightly interpreted—the Bible was from cover to cover, every sentence of it, not a cluster of human opinions, more or less fallible, but the sure revelation of the mind and will of God. It was only in a very subordinate sense that that Book was a human book. The rock on which the Methodist Church was built was the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture. It was only the Churches that were true to the uttermost to the plenary inspiration of the Bible, to its sovereign character as the Word of God, that could meet the needs of the age, and that would live on without a wrinkle on their radiant brow.

THERE was a very large gathering in the Leeds Coliseum on Tuesday evening, when an interdenominational meeting was held, under the auspices of the Methodist Conference, to discuss "The Challenge of the Age to Christianity." The other speakers were entirely overshadowed by the Bishop of Oxford, who had for his subject "The Challenge in the Realm of the Social Ideal." Avoiding the vague platitudes of the religious platform he braced the minds of his hearers by committing himself without hesitation or reserve to certain definite lines of policy. Referring to the challenge of the labour movement, he said that nothing in the course of the labour movement had been so disastrous as that the wealthy employer classes and the landlords had been so rarely prepared to consider what was just until the claim that was rising had forced them to do so. The old industrial system had broken down because there was a growing consensus of opinion that cheap labour was really the most expensive, and because by a large proportion of the community the system had been seen to be unjust.

THE Christian principle, he affirmed, was that an adequate wage should be the first and not the last charge upon industry. It would require a great deal of courage for the Churches to take up this challenge, but they should identify themselves with the principle of the living wage. It was a great mistake to suppose that labour was out to get better wages simply. Labour knows that it requires the spiritual, and what it is out for is the demand for respect for personality. It was the demand to be treated as a man and not as a machine, and the attitude of the Christian Church should be one of fundamental and cordial assent. They would be in a better position to give good advice to the labour movement if in years past they had pleaded its cause instead of waiting until they were obliged to. They had been picking up the wounded when they ought to have been thundering at the gates of tyranny.

TURNING to the Women's Movement Dr. Gore gave a cordial response to its challenge. He held that the Church of Christ must meet its demand with assent. He knew nobody better qualified for the vote or who could demand it with greater justice than the vast body of women workers, and those women who had been the greatest promoters of social and moral progress. Not only, he said, do they want it, but we want them. He was convinced that we should never get proper legislation on certain grave moral questions and on matters dealing with women's labour until the women's point of view was adequately represented. If in relation to this and other questions men could see in the Christian Church courage and earnestness in meeting the social challenge there would be a change in their attitude the vastness of which they could not estimate.

THE portion of the Manchester Corporation Bill which empowers the trustees to sell Cross-street Chapel was passed by the House of Commons Committee last week. The argument was strongly pressed that inasmuch as the site is a graveyard it ought to be kept as an open space; but it was, we think quite properly, dismissed on the ground that the rights of the present owners, who hold the property in trust for religious purposes, must outweigh a very insignificant public benefit. We do not know whether the trustees are likely to make use of their new powers immediately, or what scheme may be in contemplation for the revival of the traditions of this splendid home of English Non-conformity elsewhere. But it is impossible to speak even hypothetically of the disappearance of Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, without poignant regret and a lively sense of gratitude for the part which it has played in the long struggle for freedom both in Church and State.

IS THERE A LIBERAL ORTHODOXY?

ONE question starts another. Why has Liberalism, as a word of appreciation in theology, lost of late so much of its attraction and power? By one of those subtle, unannounced changes that pass over the surface of an age's thought, there has come about this lowering of values that once shone so proudly. Why? It is not sufficient to say that the word "Liberal" has been "defamed by every charlatan" among modern movements, and "soiled with all ignoble use"; for the true coinage of grand words can stand the currency. May it be that both the word and the idea have been too violently pressed into service they are not truly fitted for? It has not always been kept in mind that Liberalism cannot of itself be a religious faith. It is a quality that attaches to the beliefs of certain people; it is not the substantial matter of the beliefs themselves. For anyone trying to describe it, it is an elusive quality, although we have no difficulty in pointing to such and such persons and movements and saying that they are Liberal. Such dissimilar minds as Richard Baxter, Robertson of Brighton, Lord Acton, Professor Harnack, are all noble instances in point. So it is possible to have a Liberal Anglicanism, a Liberal Christianity, a Liberal Romanism. But is it possible to have a Liberal Orthodoxy?

The question arises in the mind as one turns over the instructive pages of Dr. Henry W. Clark's book,* because what he there describes as Liberal Orthodoxy is not some school, existing under special circumstances, at some particular time, but purports to be one of the "great theologies" with a history stretching back into the distant past. Has there been such a historical body of Liberalism which has also maintained its orthodoxy? Is there running through all the conspicuous examples of Liberalism given by the writer (and given by him with such brilliant strokes of interpretation as to receive in almost every instance new lights and interests for our thought) any continuous and ever developing and strengthening tendency of faith and formulation, that promises by-and-by to make good its claim to have been all along the true Christianity, the essential Catholic belief? One consideration alone is enough to discredit and disperse to the four winds such a pretension. It is, that each new example of Liberalism, as it emerges to our view in its own age and setting, arises only as a divergence from the accepted orthodoxy of that age, and not as a modification of the Liberalism of the age immediately preceding. The Cambridge Platonists in the seventeenth century were the Liberals of their time. But the Liberals of the eighteenth century were not the continuators and improvers of the Cambridge Platonists. The Essays and Reviews of 1860, again, exhibited, according to Dr. Clark, a kind of Liberal Orthodoxy in their day. But in what sense is the Liberal Orthodoxy of our generation the offspring of that peculiarly unfertile stock? Indeed, the marked inability of the so-called Liberal Orthodoxy of one age to be the progenitor of its nominal successor in the next, is one of the surest marks of a secret devitalisation, which may usefully remind us of the weakness of certain religious bodies in the matter of self-propagation, and the necessity they are under of replenishment by converts from other churches. Sufficient unto the day is the Liberalism thereof. Thus, the Arianising English Presbyterians of the eighteenth century were moved by the best Liberal sentiment to protest against certain tendencies of their time. But it was a temporary situation, and when that situation was left behind, the stereotyping of their protest could only result in misfortune to the churches which inherited the work of those "Arians."

Liberalism must ever be thus sporadic in its occurrence and corrective and restorative in its function, and cannot become in itself a substantive tradition. If it could, it would then be, not Liberal Orthodoxy, but Orthodoxy—there would be no need of an adjective. The fact is, Liberals have no business with an Orthodoxy of any sort. What Liberals may very well concern themselves with (as they have most profitably done from the earliest times) is the freshening and deepening of the Christian tradition of life and love. This can only be done if Liberalism keeps its studies close to the essential spirit of religion, discriminates intuitively between the permanent core and the temporary setting, and (above all) refuses to identify itself with some inviting doctrine of the moment. Too often, as this book will amply inform us, the "Liberal Orthodox" finds that his faith is slipping from him bit by bit, doctrine following doctrine into the demolishing grip of rationalism. There is then nothing for it but to cast about for some ultimatum, some sine quâ non of orthodoxy, and declare that beyond this he will not go. That, as Dr. Clark shows, has for a long time past been the actual history of "Liberal Orthodoxy." "Nowhere has there been any violent break, nowhere any wide leap. It has all been gradual, smoothly-slipping, imperceptible."

Is not the moral plain? If the indispensable work of Liberalism is the perpetual but gradual development of Christian truth, the subject-matter of its concern cannot be any one doctrine only, however precious, nor even all doctrine only, but the whole full religion of Christ, as a living and growing reality, in its institutions and personal experience and devotional traditions, as well as its doctrines. What this means is seen at once when we observe that the Liberal Orthodoxy, of the dubious fate above indicated, is supposed by Dr. Clark to begin with the Reformation, and to be concerned only with Protestant doctrine. As if Clement of Alexandria in the early age, and Abelard in the Middle Age, and Newman in the Roman Church fighting against the obscurantists on Papal Infallibility, were not Liberals. Moreover, if Liberalism is only concerned with this or that doctrine, what vast areas of Christian interest are left out of sight. Christianity is a Church more than it is a doctrine. You come nearer to its beating heart when you study it in the living fellowship inspired by the indwelling Christ, than by any survey of its abstract principles. All this side of the matter is pitifully lacking in such attempts to deal with it as we are now considering, and that is why Protestantism is usually so hopeless in its failure to attain a full, catholic attitude towards the whole body of Christian prepossessions and convictions as they have come down to us—why, in fact, as Dr. Clark so regretfully remarks at the end of his story, "the permanent building of theological doctrine has to be waited for still." If in our age, as in all ages, truth only comes after fact, and doctrine only explains the accomplished victory of faith, we shall make no way in the larger intellectual construction of Christianity until we have realised some new embodiment of Holy Church, Free and Catholic. Orthodoxy is a pagan idea. More important for the Christian is the vision of the Church.

SAINT OR SEER?

II.

IN a former article I ventured to claim that, in the effort to become something other than harmless and contented worldlings, most human beings would succeed more happily and completely as seers than as saints; that we get above the world, not by forsaking it or by despising it, but by coming into close and vital and sympathetic relations with it, until we see through it, or discern within it a spirit and purpose kindred with the best that stirs in our own ambitions and desires. Of this seership in its humblest and homeliest form I would offer an illustration out of a recent, and, I think, typical, or at any rate not uncommon, experience.

I was sowing peas in my garden a short time ago. That in itself is, I suppose, a quite worldly occupation; its object is to increase one's material wealth, to get more out of the earth than one actually puts into it, and solely for the satisfaction of bodily appetite and desire—a perfectly natural, wholesome, and virtuous action, but wholly of the worldly sort. Yet, as I prepared the ground and drew the furrow and laid in the small round seeds, I was aware of something more than the craftiness of mere gardening ambition. There was the feeling of co-operation with the mystic forces of life. For in these hard, and apparently dead things that one sowed, there was hidden the germ of growth; and in that brown crumbly soil in which one sowed them, there were qualities and gifts which could stimulate that germ and further its growth and nourish its awakening life. And by bringing these together in that particular place I was making it possible for each one of these hard, wrinkled, lifeless-looking things to become a plant capable of bearing, perhaps, a dozen pods, and each pod a dozen peas, like those I had sown, but sweet and tender, fit for human food, as excellent and delicious food as anything the earth affords. And this feeling of co-operation with mysterious powers of nature, this sense of playing with something wonderful, silent, invisible, spiritual, waiting there to put forth its secret energy in due season, was an exceedingly pleasant experience. Though pertaining to one of the simplest and most elementary forms of productive labour, it seemed to touch the deeper springs of life and its gladness—to connect one's little doings with the great elemental forces, and with the long past of human activity upon the earth, and also with the forward reach of things towards the days that are to be.

So the immediate and present joy had in it a sufficing quality, far other and richer than that of gathering and appropriating as food the fruit of one's labour, though that would be by no means small or insignificant.

And if the crop should fail, as my sowings not infrequently do, I should still have had that greater joy. I fell to reflecting on the many foes or hindrances which beset the gardener's toil. While the seeds are still in the earth, half-sleeping there, the little bright-eyed, fur-clad field mice would probably claim some of them. As soon as those that escaped such depredators sent their green shoots above the ground, slugs and sparrows would claim a few more. Before the survivors of these grew to perfection, in flower and fruit, certain winged insects would lay their eggs in the blossom, to become devouring grubs in the ripening pods; and when those that escaped all such enemies had filled out, and were ready for gathering, the devastating jays would come, in the early mornings, and rip them open and make a noble breakfast of their juicy contents. All these contingencies came into mind as I laid those pale brown things in the soft ground, and gently covered them over and pressed them down, and left them to the chances of the weather and the fates that play their part in the affairs of nature and human life. And it seemed to me that here was a homely but very significant type of what we always have to reckon with in our conscious endeavours to advance, and to share in the higher creative movement of the world. Whenever and wherever we try to increase the good in ourselves and others, in all our efforts to rise to greater heights of well-being and nobleness, to enrich the plenitude of worthy life, to enhance the beauty or the health or the holiness of the world, we are faced by all sorts of obstacles. The enemies of progress are many and often strong, and the waste of effort seems vast and pitiful, compared with the small success that makes any visible show in the human struggle. But if we are conscious of co-operating with the mystic powers of life, and if we keep close up to the stern facts and strenuous realities of the common every-day world, and see through them to the spiritual purpose that is working there, kindred to the finest ideal that stirs and strives in our own consciousness, then we know that the battle is never lost, that the struggle is never vain or futile; and the joy of that vision is its own sure and sufficing recompense of reward.

The seer, being one who does not flee from the world, or hold aloof from it, to concern himself only with the perfecting of his own nature, must needs play his part in the great social activities and renovations of life. To the culture and development of his own finer self he will add the strenuousness of effort for the larger well-being of his fellows. He will be aware not only of the mysterious inward impulse towards personal holiness and wisdom, but also of what has been called "the urge and uplift of citizenship." And in obeying this and meeting the opposing forces of stolidity or re-action, he will know how great is the strength of resistance to progress, as it appears to the superficial view, or to the outward impression which mere events and happenings make upon the mind. But seeing through these, to the inner purpose working there, answering to that which quickens the ascending effort within himself, the joy of co-operation with the real, though invisible, creative powers will never be absent very long from his thoughts and hopes. The vision will not fail, however the outward portents threaten, or seeming disasters engulf, the labours of the elect. For the vision is of things which make and conserve their own values for the soul; to apprehend them is to possess them, is to know oneself enriched with inexhaustible treasures without appropriating to oneself alone one fraction of the world's true riches. It is all there, like the sky, and the green grass, waiting for each to see and accept and come to his own. This, perhaps, is what TRAHERNE meant in one of his "Centuries of Meditations":—"Your enjoyment of the world is never right till you so esteem it that everything in it is more your treasure than a king's exchequer of gold and silver. . . . Your enjoyment of the world is never right till every morning you awake in heaven . . . and look upon the skies, the earth, and the air as celestial joys. . . . You never enjoy the world aright till the sea itself floweth in your veins, till you are clothed with the heavens and crowned with the stars; and perceive yourself to be sole heir of the whole world, and more so because men are in it who are everyone sole heirs as well as you; till your spirit filth the whole world, and the stars are your jewels; till you love men so as to desire their happiness with a thirst equal to the zeal of your own."

TRAHERNE'S language may seem to belong to some transcendent experience, and not to "the world which is the world of all of us." Yet it has been granted to many, not only to co-operate with the mysterious creative powers, but also to share in the realisation of that serene purpose which fulfils itself at every stage of its movement in time. In movements of intense vision, of profound feeling, of impassioned love, the joy of the eternal may possess the soul, and prevail over its finitude, till the discords and disruptions of life are merged in the great harmonies. In the freshness of a new morning, the fields drenched with dew and flooded with waves of dawn; on a calm evening in spring, after rain, when the earth is fragrant with the breath of many growing things, and the singing of birds throbs in the air and pervades the light as it withdraws from plains to hills, from hills to cloudland and far horizons; in the gathering of a great company of people flushed with ideal hopes; in the dream-like reverie of one's own mind, the mood of realised intuition may come, when thought is absorbed or dissolved into pure feeling, and all desire is accomplished, and vision itself is lost in the love which excludes none and transfigures all.

I perceive that I should have stated my question more fully thus: "Worldling, Saint, or Seer—either, neither, or all three?" And then the answer might have been: "Something of all three." For a little of the worldling must needs cling to us—some participation in that plain, commonplace, unideal life of just getting and spending, owning, consuming and dispersing mere material good. And a little of the saint, also; an occasional, perhaps, for most, a daily, withdrawing from the world, a demand for solitude, a forsaking of works and of all social gossip, a retreat into the silence of our own minds, to be alone with the vast impressive silence of the Unseen and Eternal. Yes, something of the luxury of sainthood, in that sense, we shall permit ourselves. But most of all we shall believe in and care for the dignity and the humility of seership, the desire and the ambition to "see into the life of things" will be supreme. And for this two qualities of soul would seem to be necessary. First, that which holds both nature and humanity as dear and sacred to us. I should use the word "love," perhaps; but that being so loosely and variously applied, in every-day life, might easily savour of weak sentimentalism, or be suggestive of very inadequate motives. But I mean that, not only hatred and anger, but all scorn and derision, because of nature's wild and sometimes destructive doings, and because of man's delusions and stupidities of thought and speech and action, must be put away. For, with all their seeming faults and follies, we must still nobly love both nature and man ere we can discern that deeper life which is there, making its appeal to the finest and noblest in our own souls. WORDSWORTH is strictly correct when, in describing the "Serene and blessed mood" through which we see most fully "into the life of things," he calls it that mood "in which the affections gently lead us on." You must hold the world, of nature and of men, dear and sacred ere to you they can reveal the heart that throbs within them, kindred to the best within yourself.

And the other necessity of soul is intuition, or impassioned penetration; or should we call it a kind of transcendent instinct? Instinct, illumined by Intelligence, becomes Insight, to which is granted the power of seeing what intellect cannot discover, what reason cannot prove or disprove. Where logic fails, and argument has no place, the intuitive vision sees, and by its light we move among the shadows of time, conscious of a reality shining through all appearance, a spirit of good whose purpose is at one with our own loftiest ideal of good, and is in part fulfilled whenever we feel and respond to the passion of its sorrow or its joy.

We do well to cultivate the gift of Intuition, to yield ourselves, in favoured hours, to the inflowing of that light which transcends our highest reasoning and penetrates deeper than our acutest thought. For thus the evils and the horrors of the world, the imperfections we once called "sins," the wrongs we once thought hopeless in their shame, take their true place in life's experience, as things to be reckoned with, though never surrendered to, as the perishable forms of the spirit's creative movement in time, and our eyes be opened to perceive

In all poor foolish things that live a day

Eternal Beauty wandering on its way, and our ears to hear BLAKE'S call to the sorrowing daughters of Albion:—

Arise, and drink you bliss, for everything that lives is holy.

A DIALOGUE OF AIMS BETWEEN THE PHILOSOPHER AND THE NEOPHYTE.

N. I do not understand. Surely everyone knows what he is aiming at—how else could he aim at all?

P. Consider the case of a soldier who is engaged in a shooting competition. At what would you say he is aiming?

N. Why, at the target, of course.

P. Well, it is quite true; but do you think he aims at anything else? Would it be just to say that he is also aiming at proficiency in shooting?

N. Yes, but that is aiming in a different sense. It is a mere confusion of terms to identify "aiming" with a rifle and "aiming" at the acquirement of a quality.

P. We will not identify them; but is it not true that the soldier does not aim at the target without having another aim also; call it if you prefer, another "end"—the aim or end, namely, of proficiency?

N. Yes, it is quite true.

P. And it is further true, surely, that he does not aim at proficiency without still another end involved. He seeks proficiency, either because it will bring him praise and reward, or because it will be useful to him, for instance, in time of war. Is it not so?

N. Yes, if you analyse and go in for hair-splitting; but nevertheless the soldier who is shooting at a target doesn't think of all this; he is only thinking of the target at the moment of his shooting.

P. Precisely; the soldier is not aware in the moment of activity what in fullness is his aim—he is aware only of one part of it, that namely which most immediately concerns him. But he would not aim at the target if in reality he had no other aim, would he? If there were not some end beyond it, to what purpose would be the effort to make a mark in a certain defined spot?

N. I see what you mean. The soldier is aiming at gaining applause, or reward, or at becoming a better marksman, although he is not conscious of anything in particular beyond the discharge of his gun at the target.

P. You express the truth exactly. It illustrates the wider truth, that all our aims in life are only partial, although while we are occupied with them we think only of them. So a man eats food in order to be able to live well, but he does not consciously aim at good life when he sits down to a meal, but only at the relief of hunger.

N. Yes. But what has this to do with religion and practice, which is the subject of our conversation?

P. Everything. From the religious aspect, man is aiming at something he does not see or understand. As a religious being man cannot fully formulate his ideals, the great end of his endeavour, that at which he is aiming. But he constantly aims at practical things, achieves them only to realise as soon as he has achieved them that they form part of a larger aim.

N. But if he cannot at all tell what it is he aims at as a religious being, is not all his activity like that of a silly moth, which is fascinated into burning itself in an incomprehensible light?

P. No; rather like the seed in the ground, which is constrained to activity towards the light. Each step of growth, from the first cracking of the husk to the final fulfilment in blossom is a series of successful aims which lead to the accomplishment of a final aim, by no means obvious at first—the “ultimate” aim here being continuity of life.

Thus we say that man is aiming at he knows not what; but the unrest that this induces in him directs his endeavour on many partial aims. In proportion as he accomplishes these well, does he gradually live himself into the discernment of the more ultimate end at which he most truly aims.

So it is that religion teaches us to be good citizens, good husbands, good wives, good parents, good friends. It makes us aim at sincerity in our dealings with each other; at honesty in our business. He who aims well at all these targets begins to apprehend the larger, more ultimate end of life; some call it personal excellence; some call it spiritual life—the Hindu sages called it absorption into the divine consciousness. Jesus called it Eternal Life; knowledge of God, and communion with Him.

THE SUN BOOK.

I ONCE knew a quaint, quiet old man who told me that he had discovered a new rule in arithmetic; he called it the Calculus of Blessings. He explained the rule to me and how he had arrived at his discovery, and since I have experimented with it myself, not without advantage, I will recall his statement in case others, of a mathematical turn, may like to adopt it. It is applicable to a great variety of circumstances, domestic and otherwise.

He said, then, that it occurred to him one morning to ask himself how many hours the sun had shone the day before. He was somewhat surprised to find that, although he knew it had been a fairly sunny day, he was quite at sea as to the actual period the sun had been shining. However, he finally arrived at an estimate, but to make sure that he was right he asked his wife.

“Why, John,” replied the good dame, looking at her husband over the top of her spectacles, “I reckon it must have shone ten or eleven hours at the least.”

“Lor!” said John, “I was thinking about six.”

“Stuff and nonsense!” says she. “Why, it shone all the morning, and all the afternoon, too, for what I know, but then I took a nap; and I know it was shining a bit after tea. Besides, the sun must rise soon after four now June’s come in,” and she got up to look at the almanac on the wall. “There!” she exclaimed, “it rose at 3.50 yesterday morning, and you and I did not get up till a quarter to seven. How can we tell?”

“Well,” said he, “I’d like to know. I’m going to keep a little book and put it down every day.”

“Then you must get up early,” said his wife.

This was the beginning of the discovery. I have seen the sun books for some years past. They are simply small penny note-books, full of columns of dates and hours. Half-hours are entered, but not quarters. It was pointed out to my friend that the newspaper gives a daily record of sunshine at many places throughout the country, and that he could, therefore, save himself all this trouble over the daily entries, and probably have a far more accurate record into the bargain. But he would not hear of it.

“What interest is it to be informed how much sunshine other people have had?” he protested. “I want to know how much sunshine I get day by day. I want to know it and I want to feel it, and I shall not do that unless I calculate for myself.”

I agree with him. Besides, he soon found that counting sunbeams was very good exercise, and that, like many other sums, it is far from being as easy as it looks. It made him more happy and thankful, he said, for when he came to add up his totals at the end of a week, a month, a year, the number of bright hours he had enjoyed was commonly so much greater than he had imagined possible. Then sunshine came to stand in his mind for all good things; but the more he came to reckon them up the bigger grew the sum until it was quite bewildering. So the figures in the book meant to him many things besides the bright hours they actually recorded.

Problems of this kind might be too hard for children, he thought, but it would do them no harm to make the attempt to work them out. And when he has had his little grandchildren staying with him I have watched the game he has put them up to as a substitute for sun bookkeeping. On a bright morning, after breakfast, you might find them in the hall dancing about with excitement, filling their pockets with the rays which slanted through the glass panels of the front door. They would need them to keep them warm and merry, grandfather told them, and they must try and get a fresh supply every day.

SAINT OR SEER?

SIR,—My friend Mr. Jupp is so carefully explanatory of the sense in which he uses the word “saint,” and he is so scrupulous in his effort to anticipate all possible misunderstandings, that it may seem ungracious to raise even the gentlest murmur of discontent.

I do not propose to question the validity or the deep value of the differentiation he makes between his two supreme types of character. Indeed, I assume that most of your readers will heartily agree with his moral preference. But I am a little distressed by his narrow, if not dyslogistic, use of the word saint.

A writer must not be allowed arbitrarily to reduce the dignity of high and honouring words even though he fully explains his application of them, any more than a man should be permitted to ignore the law which forbids him to clip our gold coinage, though he does it in public and after open declaration of his honest purpose.

Some word Mr. Jupp needed for his contrast, but would not “recluse” (which, after all, he is forced to use as the clearer term in order to explain his restricted meaning of the word saint), or “hermit,” or “anchorite,” or “solitary” or some similarly definite and unambiguous word, have served his purpose as well? Or if he wanted to suggest a less individualistic or fanatical withdrawal from the world, would not “monk,” or “cœnobite” do? The word saint may stand for many types of character in the desert or in a cloistered community-life or in the world which is the world of all of us. It certainly includes some of Mr. Jupp’s seers—all of them, in fact, who are sufficiently intellectual to be humble-minded and childlike and prayerful. Strictly, the word saint means a person of exceptional holiness, a consecrated person [sanctus]. The chief characteristic of the saints is an utter devotion in love to Perfect Holiness experienced as a conscious communing Life. Their devotion is complete and sincere: they are usually in love with Christ, and have therefore the charm, the sweetness, and the romance of true lovers; their supreme object is absolute Holiness, and they seek to breathe its Effluence and gaze upon its Whiteness: this object is experienced not as a mere ethical ideal but as a Divine Consciousness with which they feel in intimate mystical relationship. Hence it is one cannot surrender this word to lower uses without impoverishing not merely our vocabulary but even our religious life. Does Mr. Jupp really hope the time will ever come when our tenderest and loftiest praise will be no longer “He is a saint,” but rather “He is a seer”; or when we shall speak of the most blessed union of spirits, not as “the communion of saints,” but as “the communion of seers,” or when “For all thy saints who from their labours rest” will be sung as “For all thy seers who from their labours rest”?

And passing out of this purely spiritual cycle of ideas to the more exclusively ecclesiastical order, I would remark that however imperfect the Church calendar of saints may be (both by exclusion and inclusion), we owe it to the holy men and women who bear the beautiful name of “saint” that we shall not make it suggest the cowardice of flight or the refusal of challenge or the avoidance of hardship or the disillusion of baffled sensualism. Most of the saints were amazingly active; many of them lyrically joyous; nearly all terrifyingly strong. Compared with our modern Nietzschean (petty in ideal, degenerate in body, and mean in achievement) they were colossal supermen who wrenched the world from its naturalistic course. They longed for beatitude, but they did not flinch from sacrificing peace to the call to holy war and service. If we think of typical saints like St. Augustine, who though a monk was never withdrawn from the hot and vivid conflicts of life, who toiled incessantly and in many public spheres, through days of strife and nights of insomnia: or St. Bernard, who lived in the eager clash of the intellectual political and ecclesiastical currents of his day: or St. Catherine of Siena, who ministered unweariedly to the plague-stricken and was the denouncer and adviser of Pope and Cardinal and King: or St. Joan of Arc, the virgin-mother of all soldierly and brave women—does it not become a highly inconvenient literary practice, even when it is not an anti-ecclesiastical device, unjust and derogatory to the choicest and holiest type of human excellence, to speak of sainthood as a negative withdrawal from the world?

That certain ignorant Protestants, malignant with prejudice against everything Catholic, should talk in this way is what we have learned to expect. Mr. Jupp knows better, and frankly explains himself and his meaning and so far does no harm. But the practice which he now countenances is regrettable, and I appeal to him not to lend his fine culture and spiritual insight to give it further vogue. There are, of course, many recluses and hermits among the saints as there are among scientists and millionaires. I have known University professors and wealthy snobs of commerce withdraw from the world—and more particularly from the world from which they sprang and which “made them.” For every St. Simeon Stylites in the Church there is a Shylock in the market and a Casaubon in the study. And if there is one modern to whom we should instinctively apply the word “seer” rather than the word “saint” it is Tolstoy—and he withdrew from the world almost as much as the solitaries of Scete and Nitra. If, further, there is one man whom the Church and all the world would to-day recanonise as a “saint,” and to whom the word “seer” seems all too weak and unworthy, it is Blessed Saint Francis. He withdrew from worldliness and in that sense from the world; but his life was a radiant ministry of good works. He cruelly mortified his body and confessed that he had been too hard on Brother Donkey; but he was none the less a joyous ascetic and a joculator Domini—God’s troubadour, who praised his Lord with “French-like rejoicings.” He sought poverty as avidly as we seek riches, and he found affluence while we inherit penury. He breathed his last from a naked body on the bare earth, and a flight of seraphs winged him to the Abode of Love and Ardour and Purity. And this is how M. Paul Sabatier speaks of this monk’s “withdrawal” from the world: “Francis is of the race of mystics, for no intermediary comes between God and his soul; but his mysticism is that of Jesus leading his disciples to the Tabor of contemplation: but when, overflowed with joy, they long to build tabernacles that they may remain on the heights and satiate themselves with the raptures of ecstasy, ‘Fools,’ he says to them, ‘ye know not what ye ask,’ and, directing their gaze to the crowds wandering like sheep having no shepherd, he leads them to the midst of those who moan, who suffer, who blaspheme.”—Yours, &c.,

“A NEW TYPE OF CHRISTIAN.”

SIR,—Dr. Fr. W. Foerster is not the only able man who has come to the conclusion that “the Christian religion is the sole foundation for both individual and social life.” But brilliant as may be his rationalism, impressive his suprarationalism, there are still some of us who feel that his conclusions are not, therefore, infallible. If we venture to differ from Paul, not to mention a number of extremely capable and experienced Church Fathers, we may also venture to differ from Foerster. I understand Unitarianism to be a fellowship of religious people who do not accept conclusions upon the mere authority of others.

I may have been wrong in my “recent prophecy” concerning the time when Christianity’s “claim to finality will be recognised as a perfectly natural piece of spiritual arrogance.” There is very likely a greater clinging to this extremely elastic name than I had realised. I speak from my own (necessarily limited) experience, however, when I say that there is a considerable body of opinion among people who are interested in religion which goes to confirm my “prophecy.”

The trouble, however, in this matter, as in many others, is largely terminological. What is Christianity? The residuum found by Harnack?—that indicated by Eucken? It appears to me that Eucken’s conception of the permanent in Christianity could have been extracted equally well from Buddhism, as held and practised, e.g., in Burma.

Am I a Christian because many of my conceptions are in agreement with the standpoint of the historic Christian Church? I do not think the bulk of Christians would admit it, and the name is not worth arguing for. I am in agreement with quite as much of the standpoint of historic Buddhism (especially so in regard to the treatment of animals), yet Buddhism would probably not acknowledge me. What does it matter? Both the religions and all others are mine, in whatever I find good, beautiful, true. I am the heir of all the ages and all the religions.—Yours, &c.,

“BOOKS OF LIFE.”

SIR,—The article with the above heading in your issue of the 18th inst. interested me very much, but there appears to be a great omission among the names of those whom the writer says may become the teachers and guides of this generation. It is the name of George Meredith. Possibly the writings of Meredith have not yet become so well known and appreciated as they will do when the copyrights have run out and cheaper editions are published. In the recently published “New Golden Treasury” in Everyman’s Library there is only one of Meredith’s poems, “Autumn Evensong.” And yet his poems are full of beauty and of a stern yet noble philosophy.

The author of “A Faith on Trial” and the “Hymn to Colour” should have an honoured place among the teachers and guides of this and other generations, for if, as he says, “Our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms,” yet later in life he wrote:—

I keep the youth of souls who pitch
Their joy in this old heart of things:

Who feel the coming young as aye,
Thrice hopeful on the ground we plough;
Alive for life, awake to die;
One voice to cheer the seedling Now.

Full lasting is the song, though he
The singer passes: lasting too,
For souls not lost in usury
The rapture of the forward view.

With that I bear my senses fraught
Till what I am fast shoreward drives.
They are the vessel of the Thought—
The vessel splits, the Thought survives.

Meredith deserves the gratitude of those who believe in what is called the woman’s movement, for he championed their cause when there were few to do so. He was the friend of France long before there was any talk of what is now called the Entente, and many will remember his rebuke to the late Mr. Chamberlain, when the politician advised France to mind her manners. In extreme old age he remained faithful to the ideals of his generous youth.—Yours, &c.,

THE ETHICS OF SELF-DEFENCE.

SIR,—Will not some fair-minded peace-lover give your readers an article on the ethics of self-defence? As a descendant of Quakers I hate war for its cruelty and its stupidity, but yet I know that if England were invaded by an enemy I should wish to do my utmost to help our army resist the foe by force of arms, and I am sure that the wish would not be all wrong. Christ advocated non-resistance of evil, but he also chased the wrong-doers from the Temple with scourges. I can only conclude that perhaps war in self-defence may be the lesser of two evils at present, until a further step forward in civilisation enables us to abolish it altogether.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE GREAT SOCIETY.

The Great Society. A Psychological Analysis. By Graham Wallas. London: Macmillan & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

PERDITA would not have “streaked gilly-vors” in her garden because she had heard that

There is an art, which in their pideness shares

With great creating-Nature.

Polyxenes explains that every art that modifies nature is itself natural, and Perdita is interested and pleased. “So it is,” she says reflectively. But when Polyxenes goes on to urge her in consistency to surrender her objection to “pied” flowers which (as she must now see) is based on a mere misconception, she answers indignantly :—

I'll not put
The Dible in earth, to set one slip of them :
No more than were I painted, I would wish
This youth should say 'twere well.

If Perdita could have read "The Great Society" she would have understood all about it. Nothing can be, or can come to be, that is not "natural"; but the whole collective movement of "nature," in the large sense of the sum of existing things, may come to stand in such relations to the special nature of the mammoth, for instance, that he, from his point of view, is justified in regarding it as extremely "unnatural." In that case he will be unhappy, and perhaps will be unable to live at all in such a world-gone-wrong as he finds himself in. But if he felt that he himself had taken a considerable part, thoughtlessly or through mistaken but deliberately adopted conduct, in bringing about the existing state of things, and that he might by wiser deliberation do something towards changing it, he would find matter for much searching of heart.

Is this the actual condition of human society at this moment? What if the mechanical inventions and scientific discoveries of what Alfred Wallace called the "wonderful century," while appearing to give man control over nature have actually established "things in the saddle" and made them "ride mankind"? What if "the great industry," that is to say industry ever more and more based on sub-division of labour and specialisation, has given birth unawares to "the great society" in which each individual's contact with the processes and forces that control his life is so narrowed and specialised as to obliterate all sense of direct relation between the things he does and the things he gets, all sense that his fate depends mainly upon his will and his conduct, all meaning and therefore all joy in his work, all contact between his direct perceptions and instincts and the "machinery" (aptly so called) of the industrial and political organisation upon which all his happiness depends? Can it be that "nature" organised by "human nature," but by a human nature drifting almost always, and at certain crises guided by false reasoning that makes "the light that is within it darkness," has got us into a position much more "unnatural" in relation to man's wants and faculties than pied gillyflowers or painted faces were to Perdita?

These are the questions that Mr. Wallas raises, and to which the prima facie answer indicates that we are in a "pàrlous state" indeed. Agricultural labourers are happy in their work (if not in their wages), but they are a negligible remnant of the old order that the "great industry" and "great society" have not yet assimilated. Mechanics and artisans are unhappy in their work, because there is no natural interplay between it and their store of instincts and faculties. Working girls, as a rule are happy in their work, but they ought not to be; for the happiness is only the result of their work being seen against the still more intolerable unnaturalness of a "life at home" which has yet more completely lost its significance and vitality. So we cannot acquiesce in their relative contentment, which is only the contentment of an escape from something worse.

But Mr. Wallas is not pessimistic. His book is a warning, not a dirge. We have not thought enough about the relations of our advances in technical power to the whole organisation of our society; and the need of the time is hard thinking, keen observation, and varied experiment. We are to recognise in the first place that wealth is not identical with welfare, and that it is not axiomatic that the organisation of industry is identical with the organisation of happiness. We must never allow the more evasive but more vital questions of "What is individual happiness, and how are we to secure it to individuals?" to be ignored as though they were already covered by the grosser and more easily handled questions, "What knowledge and what organisation will give us collectively the largest control over the forces of nature?" We have long been accustomed to say that the problem of distribution is more pressing than that of production, and we all endorse Gloucester's

So distribution should undoo excesse,
And each man have enough, but we are to take it more seriously than we have done, and if it is urged against any scheme for better sharing that it will diminish the amount to be shared, we are not to be scared by the prospect.

When we really know that neither maximising the "average" means of life, nor multiplying lives of misery, but securing a good sort of life, is (as Aristotle knew) the goal of a right sort of social organisation, we shall be in a position fruitfully to attack the "difficult task of adjusting the vastness of the Great Society to the smallness of the individual man" (p. 359). The greater part of Mr. Wallas's book is devoted to a study of "the smallness of the individual man," that is to say, to the "natural" limitations which prevent the average individual, for instance, from knowing the personalities of a thousand of his fellow creatures with a direct and effortless knowledge, or which make it impossible for five or six hundred persons to come together and "frankly interchange their views" on some intricate matter in which they are all concerned. We need the organised thought and the organised action of masses that our faculties do not enable us to realise or to survey.

As Mr. Wallas develops this theme (with frequent references to American psychological laboratories that have a very vivid actuality, and occasional evolutionary tags that somehow strike us as pallid), we become gradually aware of the grotesque inefficiency, both theoretical and practical, of many of our official instruments for organising thought and will in relation to the small area which the individual's faculties can directly reach, and the vast area upon which his action plays and the reactions of which upon him determine his happiness. And we also come to understand why so many of our institutions seem to work best when they depart furthest from their theoretical basis. For that theoretical basis has so often failed to take count of the most important factors of the case. All this has grown upon us as we read, and when we are ready it is driven home by the direct thrust of the author's demonstrations. Then we turn to all kinds of actually working organisations of thought and action that have been little heeded hitherto by constitution-mongers, but which actually comply with some at least of the fundamental conditions of relating (say) the human instinct of fellowship, which perhaps cannot extend effectively to more than from ten to thirty (is it?) individuals, to the vast organisation of an empire or a world-industry.

It is in searching out every form of spontaneous or official organisation, for intellectual, social, industrial, political, or other purposes, that Mr. Wallas is most ingenious, most suggestive, and most encouraging. There appears to be abundant material for the study of successful organisation if we are once set on the watch for it. Mr. Wallas examines the international co-operation in mapping the heavens, the rules of navigation, the organising of some branches of the higher and secondary education, and many other schemes and organisations with a subtle appreciation of their psychological significance. One would like to have his analysis of the Wesleyan system of class leaders, of the group organisation of various historical conspiracies or secret societies, of the Spartan army in which, according to Thucydides, you might almost say that every soldier was a general, but in which nevertheless discipline was more severe and obedience more prompt than in any other. But one of the great merits of the book is that for every one thing it says it suggests a round dozen.

In detail there is so much to discuss, so much to single out for special emphasis, and so much to challenge, that the only safe course seems to be to stop at the beginning and say nothing at all.

What, perhaps, strikes one most here, as in Mr. Wallas's previous "Human Nature in Politics," is the boldness and the faith with which he faces the stupendous collective problems with respect to which most of us are content to drift. The suspicion with which one naturally contemplates reliance on intellectual analysis in organising or reorganising society appears to be only too fully justified. The sociologist emphasises those facts and considerations of which he feels that he has gained a clear conception, and which he can bring into intelligible relation with his general philosophy; but the order in which forces reveal themselves to our thought is probably not that of the intensity with which they act upon our emotions and our wills, and so our analysis is in perpetual danger of building on a false basis. But if to escape from this we try to throw ourselves upon "instinct" we find—and here Mr. Wallas is terribly convincing—that what we call instinct is quite likely to be a mere prejudice founded upon false and exploded theories of the past, that have embodied themselves in institutions and aphorisms which really ignore or contradict the very instincts we profess to follow. We cannot find in instinct a refuge from thought, for our instincts can only guide us when they have direct access to their natural stimuli. I once heard a man say "I don't like Scotchmen—I've met five of them." This hardly strikes us as an adequate basis for so wide an induction; but how many of us had as much to go on in the way of "instinctive" data in forming our opinions of the character and purposes of the Boer Republics fifteen years ago? The subject matter on which our "instincts" exercise themselves is and must be presented to us by some process of thought and deliberate will. Mr. Wallas pleads that the thinking should be done better.

THE RENAISSANCE.

The Renaissance. By Edith Sichel. Home University Library. London: Williams & Norgate. 1s. net.

THE Renaissance, Miss Sichel tells us in her introductory chapter, was "a movement which spread over Western Europe, and may be said to have lasted over two centuries. It was between 1400 and 1600 that it held full sway." In a later chapter she apologises for discussing Bacon because the date of publication places his chief book "outside the boundaries of the Renaissance." These statements illustrate the fetters which our traditional historical terminology imposes upon the mind. The Renaissance did not begin in 1400, and it did not end in 1600, for history is not a matter of closed chapters. In the narrower sense of the term, as a revival of the classical tradition in the field of learning, of art, and of manners, the two dates given will serve very well, but they are distinctly arbitrary if we follow Miss Sichel's example and use it for a large movement of the human spirit, which may be summed up in the two words Emancipation and Expression. It is this reverence for dates which prompts Miss Sichel to claim the Elizabethans as children of the Renaissance, and to exclude the great writers of the seventeenth century, though they, too, were striving after expression with no small measure of success. Among the causes which led to the decay of the movement emphasis is laid upon the emotionalism which degenerated into pedantic sentimentality; but there is no adequate reference to the far-reaching effect of the recovery of religion. Neither the intellectual dilettante nor the devotee of neo-paganism could survive in the fires of the Reformation.

One of the best things in Miss Sichel's book is her account of Rabelais. Perhaps she slurs over the coarseness a little too easily—there must have been some real delight in things which are not seemly in that burly, many-sided mind; but we do not think she overstates his immense influence for good as one of the most constructive and essentially charitable satirists who ever lived. "Wisdom cannot enter an unkind spirit, and knowledge without conscience is the ruin of the soul." "There is only one thing that I dislike, and that is contempt of the commonplace." It is well for us to be reminded that these jewelled sentences, no less than the most unprintable obscenities of Panurge are Rabelaisian. The list of books is good, though no mention is made of Count Gobineau's well-known book, which has appeared recently in an English translation.

We suppose that it is modesty which has led Miss Sichel to make no reference to her own admirable volume, "Women and Men of the French Renaissance" or her more recent study of Montaigne.

MERE LITERATURE AND OTHER ESSAYS.

By Woodrow Wilson. London: Constable & Co. 5s. net.

WE believe that most of these essays saw the light several years ago, and the fact of their re-publication at the present moment is probably due to the exalted position held by their author. Apart from this semi-political interest they seem to contain little either in penetration of thought or distinction of style to raise them above the level of the average academic address. The last two, "A Calendar of Great Americans," and "The Course of American History," contain a good deal both in information and in criticism which will be fresh to many English readers, but the long essay on Burke, "the interpreter of English liberty," which is printed here for the first time, will probably attract most attention. It is, however, too much of a panegyric to be very illuminating, and does not attempt any re-valuation of Burke's ideas in the light of modern democratic developments. "Burke," President Wilson tells us, "is the Apostle of the great English Gospel of Expediency. . . . This is unquestionably the message of Englishmen to the world, and Burke utters it with incomparable eloquence." It is quite true, only there is a great deal more to be said. The volume also contains the essay on Walter Bagehot, "a literary politician," to which Mrs. Russell Barrington has called attention in her recent biography. President Wilson has one or two mannerisms which rather disfigure the dignity of his writing. His continual use of "'Twas" and "'Tis" in ordinary prose sounds very like affectation. May we also enter a mild protest against his condescension to Irishmen—the "innocent Irishman with his heart upon his sleeve," who is as little like the reality as the conventional figure of a Punch cartoon.

THE ALPS. By Arnold Lunn, M.A. Home University Library. London: Williams & Norgate. 1s. net.

THE publishers have, no doubt, timed the issue of this excellent little volume so that it may find a place in our holiday luggage. Mr. Lunn would be the last to wish to displace the "Alpine Flora" or the well-worn copy of "The Playground of Europe" in the portmanteau, but if there is no available chink for one book more, it can be slipped into the pocket and read with much profit in the train. In a series of short chapters he tells the story of the pioneers, the gradual conquest of the great peaks, the special features of modern mountaineering, and the Alps in literature. Some of the freshest pages are devoted to the subject of winter mountaineering. Many people will learn with surprise that the introduction of ski-ing has made serious climbing during the winter months quite practicable. "In winter, the main difficulty is getting to the high mountain huts.

Above the huts, the temperature is often mild and equable for weeks together. A low temperature on the ground co-exists with a high temperature in the air. Rock-ridges facing south or south-west are often denuded of snow, and as easy to climb as in summer." Where so much has been compressed into a small space it may seem ungracious to ask for more; but short chapters on Alpine flowers and the life and industry of the people in the high Alps would have been welcome. Probably Mr. Lunn is too enthusiastic a climber to have much sympathy with dull people, who only go for walks, but we think that an excellent chapter might be written on the Alps for walkers, in the interest of those of us who are too old to climb or too poor to pay for guides. There is an excellent bibliography which will help many readers to renew the vigorous excitements of their holiday by the winter fire.

THE "Standard" edition of the Works of George Meredith only calls for the comment of a cordial welcome. Two volumes—THE ORDEAL OF RICHARD FEVEREL and THE SHAVING OF SHAGPAT—are before us clad in a pleasant binding of sober blue cloth. The print is larger and the page less crowded than in the familiar red edition; but the top margin has been cut too close, giving an otherwise handsome volume a rather dumpy appearance. The next volumes, which are announced to appear next week, will be EVAN HARRINGTON and SANDRA BELLONI. (London: Constable & Co. 6s. per vol.)

THE REDSHANK'S STORY.

"WHEN the three ladies had decided that we were redshanks we hoped they would go; but I soon heard them planning to find our nest. They sat on a rock waiting for me to go on the nest again. As my clutch of four eggs was now complete I was most eager to begin hatching out; but I am no pullet. I am an old bird that has learned to be wary. I therefore flew about with my husband hoping to tire them out. But they sat on; so I alighted a long way from our nest, and, being much too cunning to make directly for it, walked slowly in an irregular and very wide sort of zigzag towards it. More than once I purposely went beyond it. They watched me all the time. To further deceive them, if this were possible, I then ran hastily a few yards in quite the opposite direction, as if I had seen a fat worm. Then I began to walk in shorter zigzags till I reached my nest. Now, although I had zigzagged for at least six minutes, those people had steadily kept their eyes on me, and I heard them say that they could just see my head above the tuft of herbage behind which I sat. They, too, were cunning; for they took note of what they called landmarks, so that if I rose they could still find the spot. 'Just in a line between the old petrol tin and that clump of thistles by the wall,' I heard one say. Then they put some bits of chip at the foot of the rock where they sat. They wished to be able to stand on the very same spot another day if they did not succeed that day in reaching my nest.

"There was a wide ditch—a sough they called it—between them and the nest. They could not cross this, so one of them remained standing on the chips while the others went a long way round so as to reach my breeding place from the other side of the field. I heard their feet going 'squitch, squotch' in the wet places; they had much ado to pick their way, but they held on, and when they were opposite the lady on the chips she began to direct their course by pointing right or left with her stick if they got off the track. So far, I had stuck to my nest; now I rose and joined my mate, who was wheeling and shouting above them. We went through all our best flying tricks in the hope of distracting their attention, but all to no purpose. They never once looked at us, but only at the ground and at the signalling lady. When at last they came upon the nest they were delighted with it. I was aching to see them go, but they took out a note-book, and one wrote while the other dictated. This is what they wrote:—'Eggs, pale buffish brown, spotted and blotched with rich dark brown. Four in number, and pointed at the thin end. The four pointed ends are placed in the centre of the nest.' Then each picked up an egg and laid it against her cheek, saying how warm it felt. To my joyful surprise they laid the eggs most carefully in the nest, and saying that they must not keep the little mother—that was poor me—too long from her eggs, went quickly away.

"Before they were out of the field I was back on the nest, and began to breathe more freely. The carts and motors on the road above the field did not alarm us, we were used to them, as we were to the trains. Nor did we mind the people who passed by. What worried me was the folks who stood still, staring over the wall into our field, often pointing us out to one another. This last action made me so nervous that I would sit quaking, ready to rise into the air if my ever watchful mate gave the alarm note I knew so well.

"A few days after the ladies had been, some cows were put into the field. They kept mostly to the low end where the pool was, but I can tell you they gave me some anxious hours. The horses actually seemed to wish to avoid our nest, for they would dash close past and not touch it, but cows are heavy blundering beasts, and will lie on a nest if you don't scream at them, and sometimes if you do!

"When we had begun to get used to the cows a worse trouble came. Scores of sheep, with their lambs, were driven in at the low gate. The animals did not like this lowland pasture, they wanted to be on the fells, so they went restlessly up and down, ba-ba-ing to the lambs to follow them, and giving us little peace till the men, who had only put them there over the week-end, came and took them away. Next day we had a visit from a gentleman who took some measurements in the field. He chanced to see my nest, and picked up an egg. I implored him to put it back, but he laid it carefully between cotton wool in a little box, and carried it away. I was thankful he did not take the lot."

"Did those ladies come again?" "Yes, most days one or other appeared, but they never stayed more than a minute at the nest, often less, and never did any harm. They seemed curiously anxious to know all about birds and their ways, and would often bring food with them, and spend hours in this field and the next one where the skylarks build so much. I noticed the excitement of the ladies when one day the three came and found that two of my eggs had tiny bits of shell chipped out at the broad end. 'Oh!' said one, 'see, somebody has injured these eggs.' But one of the others told her that the chipping was done by the chick, which, when ready to hatch out, taps on the inner wall with its beak tip, which is protected by a very hard bony sheath that fits closely, and falls off naturally when its work is done. 'Let us listen,' said this lady; 'these two chicks are certainly more or less lively, we may hear something.' So each in turn knelt down with her ear just over the eggs, and each distinctly heard a piping going on. It was my two eldest chirping in the shell. When they had all heard it they hurried away, saying they must let me get back quickly or the young might come to grief. Not long after, all my three were safely hatched out." "How long did you have to feed them in the nest?"

"Didn't you know that young red-shanks are able to leave the nest almost at once? When they leave the shell they are dressed in coats of fluffy down; they are so pretty, reddish buff with brown spots. No, we don't have to carry food to a nest for days at a time as you do; but ours is no easy task, I assure you. Our fluffy three were in constant danger from men and women, horses, dogs, and what not; and we had, and still have, to keep a sharp look-out, and tell them what to do. They are obedient little dears, and if we make the sound that means 'crouch and keep quite still,' down they go in a second, and do not stir till we give the signal. But here come the horses for their morning canter. I must attend to my youngsters, so you will excuse me. Good-bye."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

A VETERAN AMERICAN MINISTER.

THE name of the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones is familiar to many of our readers as editor of Unity and minister of All Souls' Church, Chicago. The splendid social work which he has accomplished at the Abraham Lincoln Centre in connection with All Souls' Church is recognised and honoured on both sides of the Atlantic. The Report for 1913, which has just come into our hands, contains a full account of the memorable meeting when a portrait of Mr. Jones was presented to the Centre. In reply to the numerous speeches of gratitude and congratulation, Mr. Jones paid the following tribute to the good Welsh stock and the simple home life which have helped to make him what he is:—

I am tempted to tell a story I have never told before. May I give you a hint of where this Jenkin Lloyd Jones of whom you have spoken so many nice things, came from. Sixty-five and more years ago two brothers, partners, were engaged as country hatters on a far-off Welsh hilltop. They pieced out their craft by working in summer time a little farm of ten acres. It supported one horse and one cow. The hats they made in the winter time they sold at the neighbouring fairs during the summer. Sometimes business was so prosperous that they hired two journeymen to help them in the business. One of the brothers was married and was the proud father of seven children. The other brother, unmarried, accepted into his heart the brother's family, so it became a family with two fathers.

Into the brain and heart of these hatters came the radical spirit that in the 'forties bloomed all over Europe into prophetic expectations. Across the Atlantic came the tidings of a new land blooming into new opportunities. There children might grow into privileges impossible in the home land. And so the cosy home, the prosperous little business was abandoned and the bachelor-father said to the father-brother, "You stay with the wife and children another year. I will go in advance and find a place to house the flock and a year hence you may bring the babies." So the bachelor-brother went ahead. Next year the father and wife and seven children, one of them a baby, followed.

They stopped on their way to the wild western land to bury one beautiful blossom, the three-year-old pet who loved the baby. Her grave was dug by the way, never to be revisited by kindred.

They secured one hundred and twenty acres of government land in the heavy woods of Jefferson County, Wisconsin, at $1.25 per acre. In their ignorance they dared not trust themselves to the open prairies that were so available and so fertile, and so they founded a home in the wilderness where the trees had to be cut in order to catch a glimpse of the sky. The log house was reared and for the first six months covered with basswood bark, for they had to acquire the skill of the axe and the draw-knife before they could make the shingles to properly cover it.

When the seven children found lodgment inside these four walls of logs the bachelor-father again said, "You stay with the children, work away in the woods, I will go and find work that will bring the ready money that will sustain the babies until we get something out of the land." For, when the one hundred and twenty acres were paid for, a yoke of oxen and two cows bought, there was left in the father's hand just one round gold sovereign. The bachelor-father found employment in a pioneer sawmill in the woods, and in less than six months after they had arrived word came that he was sick unto death. His body was brought through the woods where there were no roads, and the partner-brother, priest in his own household, broke the silence of the woods by singing in Welsh the old hymn of consolation, read the Scripture, made the prayer, and then fell unconscious on his own threshold, remaining so for hours. The stalwart fir tree had broken, but the gentle mother nursed back the broken father to life and the two went on with their pioneering.

In order to make the story complete I must weave in another strand. These partner-brothers had an uncle who was president of a little Welsh college on the Cardigan shore. This president of an heretical school was smitten with the heresies of Socinus before the word "Unitarian" was born. When he learned that these cousins were to break the old ties, he came over the hills on horseback to see the father. He said, "Richard, I am glad you are going to America. It is a brave thing to do, and America has a great future; but you will see many hardships, and perchance you will never realise what you now hope to secure; but your children will. You have two boys, twelve and fourteen. Leave me one of the boys. Let him stay with me. I will give him a college training, and if it is in him I will prepare him for the Unitarian ministry, and when he is grown up I will send him to you, and he perhaps will be the first to preach your faith in the new land." It was a fair proposition, and it brought sleepless nights to father and mother. But the divine claim of parenthood held the two boys and the family came to America complete.

In the solitudes of the settlement, the isolation of the religion which was theirs, the offer of the college president haunted the conscience of the stalwart father and the gentle mother, and they wondered if they had done rightly, and when the babe that was at the mother's breast on the high seas grew larger, the father would put his hand upon the head of the little boy and say, "I guess I will have to send Jenkin back to his uncle Dave Lloyd to study at Carmarthen College, and maybe he will make a Unitarian minister of him." I never knew the time when I did not more or less consciously feel that dedication.

But the vicissitudes of a pioneer's home put far away my dreams of a college course, and when the war came on it wiped off the last hope of such a possibility. With the foolishness of youth I was sure that three years of service had put my study days far behind.

So having survived the war I accepted, as I thought, the destiny that was mine, and took my place between the horns of the plough and grasped the hoe and the pitchfork. Thus I laboured one year after the war. Then one hot harvest day the elder brother was cradling and I-binding after him, when he stopped to whet this scythe. By some sort of spiritual explosion, unpremeditated and unexpected, I said: "Thomas, how do you think father would get along if I was to leave?" A clap of thunder from the clear sky would not have astonished the brother more. "Why, I don't see how he can get along." John and I are setting up for ourselves. The farm is not yet paid for, and father is getting old, you know. Why, what is the matter with you? I thought you were content." "Thomas, I think I must go to school." "Well, I wish you could go to school, and perhaps you may be able to do so in two or three years when the mortgage is lessened. But why, what has put it into your head? What do you want to do?" "Thomas, I feel as though I must try to be a Unitarian minister." "Well, if you will go and be a minister, and a good one, father will get along all right, because John and I will take care of him."

And in three weeks I was off for Meadville.

Now, all of this palaver of yours, as far as it is merited, must be passed backward to that fir-tree and that rose-bush that brought from Wales the aspirations of the broader faith and the higher thought. He whose name I bear was the Uncle Jenkin whose grave was dug under the great elms in the woods and whose funeral service was conducted by his brother, the father and priest of his household. Now that little buryground has grown populous, and on a humble slab is carved in the Welsh tongue the words, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." At the foot of the hill thunder daily great transcontinental trains, inter-urban cars hourly pass, and the perpetual hum of the automobile is heard. Chicago millionaires make their homes on the banks of what was then "Mill Pond," but is now Oconomowoc Lake. Where the homes of the luxurious now are was the sawmill in which the uncle from whom I am named breathed his last.

Dear friends, if you seek the proper screen upon which to throw your gratitude, go back to that clearing in the woods, back to the home where the hatters made hats for peasant people; go back to where the original Jenkin Jones, in whose line I am the third to preach heresy, preached his first heretical sermon in his mother's garden because the open door had been slammed in his face the Sunday before by the rector's wife, who could not stand such heresies in the old church. That is where your thoughts ought to go."

EVENSONG AT ST. MARGARET'S, WESTMINSTER.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

LYING under the shadow of the noble Abbey the church appears dwarfed and diminutive, but it is a building of no mean size with the stains of age upon its stones, and rich in historical associations. The present incumbent is Canon W. H. Carnegie, who distinguished himself some years ago as a Lenten preacher at St. Paul's, and for that reason we desired to hear him again.

It was no special occasion, but when we arrived just before 7 p.m. the church was practically full, and late-comers were soon occupying the extra seats placed in the centre aisle. The slump in church attendance which appears to be so general does not therefore appear to have affected St. Margaret's, and certainly to the heart that feels the need of worship there was in this service, so well balanced, with its fine music and sweet singing, much to appeal, while there was little to arouse the opposition of the critical or sensitive. Unlike so many Nonconformist services, the Anglican service is no one man business. The sermon itself is but an episode, clerks, organist, choir, people, have each their part to play, and only when he entered the pulpit did the preacher become evident.

Canon Carnegie is a tall, somewhat spare man, with a stoop of the shoulders such as many amiable men of his build indulge in. On this occasion we were to have no carefully prepared scholarly discourse, but rather an intimate talk. Moreover, there was a distinct impediment in the preacher's speech which we do not remember to have noticed before. However, in spite of these features, or perhaps because of them, he kept the attention of his audience.

Leaning across the pulpit desk, he said he wished to speak to them on the words, "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." The righteousness here referred to did not mean that super-excellence which made others avoid those said to possess it. It simply meant right conduct. Our religion must end in conduct to be effective. The kingdom of heaven was, therefore, the company of those who acted rightly; God shut out no man from it, we simply shut ourselves out by not complying with the conditions. Emotionalism we must have; all religious worship was based upon it; but the religion that was limited to it was vain. Here was the danger of revival services. This he illustrated from incidents in his own career. The fault of the Scribes and Pharisees might be summed up in the one word "vulgarity." And by that he did not mean coarseness, but the self-satisfied life of low aims and the absence of ideals. The tradesman whose only desire was a suburban villa and a motor car, and the politician who laboured for personal ends were instances in point. Complacency was the attitude of vulgarity, the opposite to which was faith always based on humility. The Pharisees were complacent when they had observed all the ceremonies required by the law, so also were many churchgoers to-day. Religion required that we should measure our lives by some high ideal, and then the thought of our shortcomings would keep us humble. That was the explanation of the publican's cry, "God be merciful to me, a sinner," and also of Paul's assertion that he was "the chief of sinners." As our own hills were dwarfed when measured by the Alps, so our lives would appear poor when measured by the standard of Christ. The preacher warned his hearers that the churches were on their trial to-day. The best men, he acknowledged, were outside organised religion, they avowed that they saw no need for it. What they desired was action.

After the closing hymn and the benediction, the hymn "God that madest earth and heaven" was sung as a vesper without organ accompaniment, and formed an impressive termination to a very rich and helpful service. One novel feature to us was the people joining in the general thanksgiving. An organ recital followed, but lest this should be deemed to have been the attraction it may be added that more than half the congregation did not stay for it.

DR. BOOKER WASHINGTON TO VISIT EUROPE.

WE learn that Dr. Booker Washington intends to visit Europe early next year with the object of lecturing upon the progress of the negro race. He will speak at a demonstration during the Free Church Congress to be held in Leicester in March, and will then pay a visit to several cities in the Kingdom before going to Brussels, Berlin and Paris, returning to England for further engagements in April and May. Mr. Andrew Carnegie is taking considerable interest in the tour, and has written to the Rev. J. H. Harris as follows:—"I am greatly pleased to hear that Dr. Booker Washington is coming to Europe next spring to lay before public opinion some facts concerning the progress of the negro race. I know of no one better or as able to do this as Dr. Washington, who, as I wrote you on a former occasion, is a Joshua and Moses combined." Requests for the services of Dr. Washington may be sent direct to him, or through the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge-road, S.W.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Ambleside.—Sunday morning services will be held during the summer in the Knoll Chapel, Rydal-road, the use of the chapel having again been very kindly given by the Rev. P. M. Higginson. The Sundays arranged for run from July 26 to September 13, and the ministers who will take the duty are the Revs. D. Walmsley, W. Whitaker, H. W. Hawkes, Charles Peach, and Neander Anderton.

Banbury.—The Rev. G. S. Woods, under whose leadership the Christchurch Chapel has made substantial progress, concluded his period of ministry on June 28. He carries with him to his new sphere at Taunton the good wishes of the members of his former congregation. Mr. S. T. Pagesmith, a special student of Manchester College, Oxford, has been appointed as the student-pastor for the ensuing year. He commenced his ministry on July 5. On the evening of July 7 a congregational social was held in the schoolroom.

Heywood.—The Rev. Joseph Worthington, who has been pastor of the Unitarian Church at Mountpottinger, Belfast, for ten years, has accepted an invitation to be the pastor of the Britain-hill Unitarian Church, Heywood, in succession to the Rev. T. Bowen Evans, who recently resigned the pulpit.

London: Acton.—The Rev. A. C. Holden, M.A., has resigned the pulpit of the Acton Unitarian Church.

London: Dingley-Place Mission.—The 35th annual flower show was held on Tuesday afternoon, July 14, followed by an evening meeting, when Mr. E. R. Fyson, of Ilford, took the chair, and Mrs. Fyson kindly distributed the prizes. Songs and duets were rendered by Mrs. Round, Mr. A. T. Young, and Miss V. G. Withall; 331 plants were sent in for competition by 86 competitors. Mr. T. B. Taylor gave some beautiful plants to be presented to those who were highly commended; 57 prizes were given and 54 exhibitors commended.

London: Stepney.—At a meeting of the congregation of College Chapel, Stepney Green, recently held, a letter was read from Mr. W. R. Marshall resigning his post of lay minister in charge at College Chapel, stating that the arduous character of his school duties renders this step imperative. Mr. Marshall has most faithfully and ably ministered to the congregation for many years, and deep regret is felt at his withdrawal.

Sheffield District.—The Doncaster Free Christian Church, having made application for admission, has been cordially received into the Sheffield and District Association of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches, which now comprises 11 churches.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The annual flower service of the Sunday school, in connection with the Unitarian Church, was conducted on Sunday afternoon, July 19, by the minister, the Rev. Arthur Scruton. The open-air addresses delivered weekly by Mr. Scruton in Stockton High-street are proving an even greater success than last summer. Last week, the largest crowd that has yet assembled gathered to listen to an address on "Progress in Religion and in Social Life," this being the eighth address of the series. As a result of these meetings a number of strangers have been present at the Sunday services in the church.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE NATIONALISATION OF MOUNTAINS.

Mr. Henry Salt, whose life is apparently spent in trying to check the selfish and cruel instincts of average humanity, has written a vigorous pamphlet on "The Preservation of Mountain Scenery," in which he shows how much harm has already been done in Wales and the Lake District by certain vandals, including motorists engaged in what has been called "the fascinating sport of hill-hunting." The temptation to try the speed, endurance, and climbing capacity of a good car against the steep slopes of some once inaccessible mountain is one to which the motorist easily succumbs, and his desire to conquer new heights is turning some of the loveliest mountain passes into places of terror, made hideous by snorts and hootings which must have frightened all the local deities away by this time. Mr. Salt makes the suggestion that the National Trust, while not relaxing its efforts for the rescue by purchase of particular tracts, should do a still greater service by organising a movement for pressing on the Government the need of taking some active steps to counteract the injury which is being done to these sanctuaries of the people.

THERE is, he maintains, "only one thorough solution of the problem, and that is to nationalise such districts as Snowdonia, Lakeland, the Peak of Derbyshire, and other public holiday-haunts, and so to preserve them for the use and enjoyment of the people for all time. If parks, open spaces, railways, tramways, water, and other public needs can be nationalised, why not mountains? It is impossible to over-estimate the value of mountains as a recreation ground for soul and body, yet, while we are awaking to the need of maintaining public rights in other directions, we are allowing our mountains—in North Wales, and elsewhere—to be sacrificed to commercial selfishness." An example of the way this is done is to be found in a pamphlet published by the London and North-Western Railway at Llanberis defending the Snowdon railroad for "imperial" reasons, leading to the inference that we ought to be proud of the fact that England no longer lags behind other countries "with regard to the application of mechanical means for reaching the peaks of mountains."

THE "ROBERT HUNTER FUND."

In response to the appeal on behalf of the memorial fund to the late Sir Robert Hunter, a sum of about £1,000 has been collected, and the committee has decided, in consonance with the wishes of the family, that this amount shall form a permanent fund vested in trustees, to be called the Robert Hunter Fund. The interest of this is to be applied from time to time to assisting schemes in connection with the open-space movements, which owed so much of its success to the devotion of the late Sir Robert Hunter. It is hoped that the fund may be considerably augmented by gifts from those in sympathy with the work of protecting commons, footpaths, open spaces, and places of natural beauty, so as to enable the trustees to make grants of real value when cases requiring assistance arise. Contributions may be sent to 25, Victoria-street, S.W. The treasurer is Canon Rawnsley, and the hon secretary, Mr. S. H. Hamer.

WORN-OUT HORSES.

A company has just been formed under the name of "British Animal Products (Ltd.)," the directors of which are Lord Hardinge, Sir William Younger, Mr. Leonard Noble, and Mr. Loudon Douglas (members of the Council of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals), Mr. E. G. Fairholme (chief secretary of the same society), and Mr. Charles Reinhardt (chairman of the Council of Justice to Animals and of the Horses and Drivers' Aid Committee). The object of the company is to create a market for the by-products of worn-out British horses, and to establish centres where they can be humanely destroyed. A central factory is to be established in England, with subsidiary depots, and resting farms throughout the country where the animals are to be painlessly slaughtered, and an option has already been secured for the purchase of a factory at Barking Creek, which is fitted with the necessary plant. The flesh, hair, hides, hoofs, and other portions of the carcasses can be utilised for a number of purposes calculated to make the scheme entirely profitable, while at the same time a way is found of ending the traffic in out-worn horses carried on between this country and countries on the Continent, which has been responsible for so much revolting cruelty.

STUNTED CITY WORKERS.

"One is forced to the conclusion," said Mr. Harry J. Wilson, H.M. Inspector of Factories of Glasgow, in the course of a paper on physical deterioration in its relation to the industrial classes at the Conference of the Royal Institute of Public Health at Edinburgh, "that a considerable portion of the working population are being artificially stunted to a grave extent." Deterioration was largely a matter of poverty. Tea, he added, was doing more than was suspected to undermine the industrial classes. He contrasted the figures of the height and weight of 2,749 men reared in industrial centres at indoor occupations with those of 440 navvies, iron workers, and salmon fishermen who had been born and bred in rural districts and had been always occupied, except in the case of the iron workers, in purely outdoor callings. The figures were:—City-bred Men: Sheffield (grinders), examined, 1,080; age, 25 to 55; height, 5 ft. 4 in.; weight, 9 st. 10 lb. Birmingham (brass workers), examined, 500; height, 5 ft. 6 in.; weight, 9 st. 8 lb. Newcastle (machine tenders), examined, 200; height, 5 ft. 5 in.; weight, 10 st. 9 lb. South Wales (tin workers), examined, 969; height, 5 ft. 5 in.; weight, 10 st. Total, 2,749; average height, 5 ft. 5 in.; weight, 10 st. Country-bred Workers: Navvies (English, Scotch, and Welsh), examined, 218; height, 5 ft. 8 in.; weight, 12 st. 2 lb. Iron and steel workers, Durham, examined, 114; height, 5 ft. 7 in.; weight, 12 st. 2 lb. Speyside salmon fishermen, examined, 63; height, 5 ft. 9 in.; weight, 12 st. 1 lb. Navvies (County Kerry), examined, 45; height, 5 ft. 9 in.; weight, 12 st. 11 lb. Total examined, 440; average height, 5 ft. 8 in.; average weight, 12 st. 4 lb.

PRISONERS' MUTUAL WELFARE LEAGUE.

The quarterly record of the Penal Reform League, which includes a great deal of useful information within its sixty-four pages, gives a description of the Mutual Welfare League in the New York State Prison at Auburn, U.S.A., formed by the prisoners themselves aided by Mr. T. M. Osborne, chairman of the State Commission on Prison Reform. It is an experiment in enabling prisoners to fit themselves for a more self-controlled life outside prison by giving them greater control of their life inside. It has already demonstrated its usefulness to such an extent that the warden has given to its grievance committee the administration of the minor discipline of the prison. The following declaration was made a few weeks ago by forty-nine men prisoners standing with uplifted hands in the prison chapel, who had been elected in secret ballot by 1,350 of their fellow inmates to constitute the board of delegates of the League:—"I solemnly promise that I will do all in my power to promote in every way the true welfare of the men confined in Auburn Prison; that I will cheerfully obey the rules and regulations of the duly constituted prison authorities, and that I will endeavour to promote friendly feeling, good conduct and fair dealing among both officers and men, to the end that each man, after serving the briefest possible term of imprisonment, may go forth with renewed strength and courage to face the world again. All this I promise faithfully to endeavour; so help me God." A similar League has been organised among the 117 women in the women's prison.

THE CHILD WELFARE INQUIRY OFFICE.

At a Conference of the principal Child Welfare Societies which was held early in the year it was decided to form a General Council, composed of delegates representative of established societies and public bodies directly concerned, to discuss subjects of general interest concerning child welfare with a view to taking action or influencing public opinion. It was also decided to establish an inquiry office at which information could be obtained regarding the welfare of children in general, or of an individual child. This office is now open, and applications, which will be given prompt attention upon the same day they are received, should be made to the secretary, 845, Salisbury House, London Wall, E.C. If there is a society which deals specially with the subject of any inquiry, the inquirer will be immediately put into communication with such society; in other cases information will be given direct. The Inquiry Office is under the direction of the General Council referred to, upon which 64 societies and public bodies are represented, dealing with children and young people, and covering the following aspects of child life:—Protection, Rescue, Education, Health, Sickness, Religious, Moral, Social and Industrial Welfare.

Secretary and Registered Offices: J. H. HARVEY, 116, Judd Street, [W.C.]
Assistant Secretary: Miss DOROTHY J. ROBERTS.

This Company has been formed to provide Healthy Homes for the large and ever-increasing number of women of gentle birth who, imbued with a praiseworthy spirit of independence and laudable ambition, wish to strike out a career for themselves and find in our mighty metropolis some sphere of usefulness and activity advantageous to themselves and dependents and equally advantageous to the thousands of employers who regard their lady assistants as the most reliable and conscientious of their employees.

An exceptional opportunity having presented itself, it was felt by those interested that it was incumbent upon them to endeavour to supply the want so beautifully defined in the following words:—

THE PRAYER OF THE LONELY WOMAN IN THE CITY.

All day I have looked at the multitude, and no eye met mine in understanding, no life touched mine in help, no hand clasped mine in fellowship. In a thousand companions I have felt no companionship. A myriad hearts go by, but none stop to beat in time with my heart. I am hungry for friendship, starved for human cheer. I come to Thee, here solitary in my little room in its pitiful stillness, and I come not with vain request for things; I do not ask Thee for spiritual ecstasies; I come for comradeship, to feel that some One is living on with me, though in silence. Some people are so rich in fellowship; their days are feasts of friends. O God, I ask but the crumbs of human feeling that fall from their table. Thou who guidest souls through the chartless sea of life, steer some woman's soul my way, bring me the cheering convoy of honest men, and let little children find me. Keep me warm and human that they may know me when they find me. Keep me wise and prudent that no pirate in the seas of love may deceive me. Infinite, great Spirit, reveal Thyself to me as a Friend and the Maker of Friends.

The premises already secured are exceptionally well suited for the intended purpose, being that commodious mansion No. 1, Abbey Road, St. John's Wood, standing in its own grounds of about an acre (recently occupied by the late John MacWhirter, Esq., R.A.), within a short distance of the City and West End and in close proximity to Regent's Park and Hyde Park.

The beautiful house will be retained in its entirety for the amenities of the establishment and an additional 120 rooms built as further sleeping accommodation. Other eligible premises are also under consideration.

Various Homes have already been established, and, despite restricted accommodation and comfort, have proved a great success, all having a long waiting list of those seeking accommodation.

The scale of charges will be fixed as low as possible so as to afford a clear 6% interest on the capital invested.

The Chairman will gladly welcome any suggestions from those who are interested in the welfare of a large and deserving class of Lady Workers, feeling sure that the scheme is one that will commend itself as worthy of support and encouragement, providing at the same time a thorough sound investment.

Intending shareholders are requested to kindly intimate what number of shares they would like reserved.
